Our Library Table.

R. H. Woodward & Company, Baltimore, have published a daintily dressed booklet, entitled DAILY HELP. It consists of selections from Spurgeon, one page for every day in the year, compiled by "E. F. W."

J. B. Lippincott Company have published in the popular Leatherette binding a booklet of poems by David Henry Wright. The poems are upon a variety of topics, are brief, and many of them beautiful in thought and expression. The book is named from the initial poem, IS PEACE ON EARTH?

TWILIGHT STORIES. This dainty little volume is one of the Library Series, published quarterly, by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, and is filled with short, crisp, temperance stories and bright poems, well fitted for the eager minds of children and young people.

The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

OUR CHILDREN OF THE SLUMS, by Annie Bronson King. The contents of this volume is made up of word-pictures of the little ones of the poor. The author makes no plea on their behalf, only presenting the eloquent plea of pictures all too sad but true, In various chapters she portrays different scenes—misery their common characteristic. The style is strong in its unique simplicity.

D. D. Merrill Company, New York and St. Paul.

HEREDITY; OR HARRY HARWOOD'S INHERITANCE, by George Whittaker is a temperance story of interest. It embraces, as its title tells for itself, one phase of the drink-evil,—the inherited taste for alcoholic stimulants; the victim of said inheritance fighting long and hard, almost to lose the battle but saved "so as by fire" through Christ. The book is an earnest one, written with an evident desire to warn against this enemy of soul and body.

McDonald & Gill Co., Boston.

HOLINESS YEAR BOOK, 1893, edited by Rev. Geo. Hughes, published by Palmer & Hughes, 62 and 64 Bible House, New York City.

An annual, giving a comprehensive view of the work for holiness throughout the world. In addition to this, it contains the usual calendar and astronomical notes, daily Scripture readings, a portion for the morning and evening, Sabbath topics, and interesting family readings and economics. It is an excellent book for any Christian home.

COLUMBUS AND WHAT HE FOUND, by Mary H. Hull, Chicago, Ill.

This book has been prepared especially for young people. It is written in a clear, interesting style, and presents reliable history very attractively. This Columbian year will be a large object lesson for the children and young students, not only of our own land, but of others, and the book above named is most timely. It is suitably bound in cloth, printed on heavy paper in the clear print that young people delight in, with wide margins.

Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

A COMPENDIUM AND QUESTION BOOK OF PARLIAMENTARY LAW arranged by Lillian Cole Bethel. This little volume only about fifty pages in number and small in dimensions—is what one might term "meaty," since every word in it is worth "inwardly digesting." It is dedicated to womankind and has been especially designed as a handbook that may be relied upon in the study of Parliamentary form. It will be found of great value to W. C. T. U. women who wish to post themselves thoroughly on the ways and means of entering the "arena of discussion," and becoming victors therein.

Published by the author, Columbus, Ohio.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS ALMANAC for 1893, is replete with fresh material. The election tables give the vote in every county and are an interesting study. The table of exports and imports is exhaustive. The most prominent facts of all the presidential nominating conventions and caucuses since Washington are given. Also short sketches of prominent men, and the letters of acceptance from the four presidential candidates. The World's Columbian Exposition receives no small attention, in an illustrated assortment of valuable facts. These are but a few of the good points of this reliable annual—in itself an exhaustive reference book.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON TALKS by Charles Cullis, M. D. These printed "Talks" are an outgrowth of consecration meetings held by the author every Tuesday afternoon in his own home, meetings which so grew that within the last years they have "often filled the auditorium of Beacon Hill church, where they still continue." The book is characterized from first to last by its childlike simplicity of expression, the author becoming, indeed, "as a little child" and having "entered the Kingdom of Heaven" even on earth, presents the truths of the Spirit so that the slowest may readily comprehend, yet in such a manner that he who is wise in these things may yet gain strength, light and comfort from its pages.

Willard Tract Repository, Beacon Hill Place, Boston.

LOVE IN WRATH, OR THE PERFECTION OF GOD'S JUDGMENTS, by Arthur T. Pierson. This is an address made by the author in London, England, before the Mildmay conference, printed in attractive booklet form. The subject is a tremendous one, but MR. Pierson handles it with exceedingly rare skill and deep insight. There is a large class of people whose creed, or accepted doctrine, has been gathered from a thousand irregular, inofficial, it may be said, sources: From books which have strayed into their hands and may or may not be orthodox, from the opinions of friends, from the influence of warped judgments, from a sermon here and a lecture there, and saddest of all from Scripture passages wrenched from their logical connection and thoroughly misunderstood. And perhaps nowhere are greater errors made than along the line of Mr. Pierson's address—God's judgments. We judge the Creator from the imperfect pattern of justice and judgment found in our own hearts; one says, "I would not punish an evil-doer thus"; another says, "How can God hate? Are hate and love compatible?" With Bible in hand and calm reason presiding, a thoughtful reading of the booklet in question will set at rest many uncertainties and clear up many doubts.

WHERE IS MY DOG? by the Rev. Charles Josiah Adams.

The author of this book has launched out into a question over which many thinkers have pondered—the immortality of the lower animals. With an evident fondness for the brute creation and an understanding of them that is an outgrowth of close observation of their ways, he proceeds with his reasoning on a phrenological basis. He considers, one by one, the physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual faculties in man, showing which of these are, without doubt, held in common with the animal, and attempting to show that some of the higher faculties may be in a degree shared by the brute creation. Mr. Adams makes not a few statements in his book to which close criticism would take exception, but in main his points are well taken and the matter, to say the least, interesting. It were better to err on the side of favoring immortality in the dog and horse and bird, than to let a gross materialism heap cruelty upon their defencelessness. With this thought evidently in mind the author closes his not uninteresting book with these words: "Will these pages save a kick, a stroke, or a pang of hunger or other pain to a dumb fellow-being? If I ever find it so, I will be thankful that I have written."

Fowler & Wells Company, 27 East Twenty-first street, New York City.

HOW NATURE CURES; THE NATURAL FOOD OF MAN, by Emmet Densmore, M. D. This "new system of hygiene" will, without a doubt, make for itself many enemies—as other hygienic departures have—since it would well nigh banish the practice of medicine from the field, on the ground that nature is her own most skillful physician and only needs an opportunity to do prompt and effective work for her patient. The foods of civilization are subjected to the severest criticism, with strong arguments against the use of bread, cereals, pulses, potatoes and all other starch foods, advising in their stead fruits and nuts, with or without meat. The book is written more for "patients" than the ordinarily healthy people but, as it says, "since all are more or less invalid"—a sad truth—it contains food for all. Aside from the question of diet—and there is large-sized wisdom in its prescriptions—it is an epitome of common sense for daily living and for the treatment of the sick. Health laws are broken more audaciously and more generally than those who do not make a special study of the situation would ever dream, and people are more responsible for their pains and aches and diseases than they can often be made to realize. The book in question is earnest and, in the main, reasonable, readable by all and many of its maxims worthy of weighty consideration.

Published by Stillman & Co., 1398 Broadway, New York, and Swan Sonnenschein & Co., Paternoster Square, London.

SAN DIEGO, Cal., and the Bay region unions formed themselves into a "union of unions" in December, and held their first meeting at Oneonta, a lovely village, fourteen miles from San Diego. They have a live temperance worker in Mrs. Ella Whitmore, county president, and are making temperance sentiment as rapidly as possible in that vine-covered land.

Too Slow in making clothes. this was. It had to go. And yet people thought it a pretty good thing in its day. Some of them couldn't believe, all at once, that there was anything better. Just so with every improvement. The old way always has some benighted ones who cling to it to the last.

Too Fast in ruining clothes, un-making them—that's the trouble with the washboard. But it's going now and going fast, to join the spinning-wheel. Women find it doesn't pay to rub their clothes to pieces over it. They can wash better with Pearline. Less work, less wear, no ruinous rub, rub, rub.

That's the modern way of washing—safe, easy, quick, cheap. No wonder that many women have thrown away the washboard.

He Survives Them all, and Recounts His Wonderful Deliverance From Poverty and Death, and His Restoration to Prosperity and Vigor of Mind and Body—Good Words for the A. O. U. W.

(Chatham Planet.)

In a Raleigh street residence there lives with wife and one child—a little ten-year-old daughter—a musician known throughout Ontario, if not the whole Dominion, as a prince among pianists, organists and choir masters—a veritable maestro and "Wizard of the Ivory Keys," and no one who has ever listened to his manipulation of the great organ in the Park Street Methodist Church, or heard him evoke "magic music's mystic melody" from the magnificent Decker Grand in his own drawing-room but will declare that his eminence is well deserved, and his peers can be but few among the professors of Divine Art. The door plate bears the following inscription:

CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC.
DR. CARL LEO VERRINDER,
Director.

To sit, as did a Planet reporter a few days ago, in a very atmosphere of sweet harmony, created by Dr. Verrinder's magician-like touch was an experience that might well be envied, and one calculated to inspire the most sentimental reveries. But sentimental moods finally vanish and leave one facing the sober and practical side of life. The music ceased and the conversation took a turn leading to the real object of the reporter's call.

"There are stories abroad," said the newspaper man, "regarding some extraordinary deliverance from death, which you have met with recently, doctor. Would you object to stating what foundation there is for them, and, if any, furnish me with the true facts for publication?" Dr. Verrinder shrugged his shoulders and laughed. "I have not," he replied, "been given to seeking newspaper notoriety, and at fifty-five years of age it is not likely I shall begin, and yet," said the professor, after thinking a moment and consulting Mrs. Verrinder, "perhaps it is best that I should give you the circumstances for use in The Planet. The story of my rescue from the grave might fittingly be prefaced by a little of my early history. We resided in England, where, though I was a professor of music, I was not dependent on my art, as I had acquired a competence. My wife was an heiress, having £50,000 in her own right. Through the rascality of a broker she was robbed almost of all her fortune, while by the Bank of Glasgow failure, my money vanished forever. It became necessary for me then to return to my profession in order to live. I do not speak of it boastingly, but I stood well among the musicians of that day in the old land. My fees were a guinea a lesson, and it was no uncommon thing for me to give twenty in a day. We came to America, landing in Quebec, where I anticipated getting an engagement as organist in the cathedral, but was disappointed. Subsequently we moved to St. Catharines, in which city I procured an organ and choir, and soon had a large clientele. Later, in order, as I thought, to better my fortune, I took up my residence in London, first filling an engagement with a Methodist church, and afterwards accepting the position of organist in St. Peter's Cathedral. In those cities I made many warm friends, and their tributes and gifts I shall ever retain as among the most precious of my possessions. It was while living in London and pursuing my art with much earnestness and labor that I received a stroke of paralysis. Perhaps,"—here the speaker rose, and stretching himself to his full height, thus displaying his well-built and well-nourished frame "I do not look like a paralytic. But the truth is I have had three strokes—yes, sir, first, second and third, and they say the third is fatal, ninety-nine times out of one hundred. Yet here you see before you a three-stroke victim, and a man who feels, both in body and mind, as vigorous as he ever did in his life. My ultimate cure I attribute to my testing the virtues of a medicine whose praise I shall never cease sounding as long as I live, and which I shall recommend to suffering humanity as I am now constantly doing, while I know of a case and can reach the ear of a patient. After removing to Chatham I had not long been here when my health further began to give way. Gradually I noted the change. I felt it first and most strongly in a stomach affection which produced constant and distressing nausea. It grew worse and worse; I myself attributed it to bad water poisoning my system. One doctor said it was catarrh of the stomach. Another pronounced it diabetes, still another a different diagnosis. I kept on doctoring, but getting no relief. I tried one medicine after another, ut it was no use.

"Grippe attacked me and added to my pain, discomfort and weakness. At last I took to my bed and it seemed that I was never going to get well. Nothing of a nourishing nature would remain on my stomach. No drugs seemed to have a counter-acting influence on the disease which was dragging me down to death. My wife would sit at my bedside and moisten my lips with diluted spirits which was all that could be done to relieve me. Besides three local doctors who gave me up, I had doctors from London and Kingston, whose skill I believed in and to whom I paid heavy fees, but without receiving any help or encouragement. It is true that a stomach pump operation afforded temporary relief, but yet I felt that my peculiar case needed some special and particular compouud or remedial agent which I knew not of. But at last, thank God, I discovered it. I had been for eighteen months a miserable wreck, unable to work, unable to eat or to sleep properly. My means were becoming exhausted. My poor wife was worn out in body and spirit. Suddenly the deliverer came! Pink Pills! Yes sir! Pink Pills—God bless their inventor or discoverer!—have rescued me from the jaws of death and miraculously made me what you see me to-day, hearty, happy, with a splendid appetite, a clear brain, a capacity for work and an ability to sleep sound and refreshing sleep—a boon that only a man who has experienced the terrors of insomnia can rightly appreciate. Bear in mind, my friend, I am no wild enthusiast over the supposed merits of this medicine. I have tested the virtues of Pink Pills and am ready to take oath to their efficacy. No one could shake my faith in them; because what a man has thoroughly proved in his own experience, and what he has had confirmed in the experience of others—I have prescribed the pills to other sick persons and know what extraordinary good they have effected in their cases—he ought to be convinced is so. I shall tell you how I came to try them. A fellow member of the A. O. U. W., the brethren of which order had been more than kind to me during my illness, recommended Pink Pills. I knew nothing about what they were or what they could accomplish. In fact, I am rather a skeptic on what are termed 'proprietary remedies.' But I started to take Pink Pills for Pale People, made by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville. From the very first, one at a dose, I began to mend and before I had taken more than a box or two I knew that I had found the right remedy and that to the Pink Pills I owed my life. In nine months I have taken twelve boxes—just six dollars' worth. Think of it, my friend! Hundreds of dollars for other treatment, and only six dollars for what has made a man of me and set me again on the highway of health and prosperity. There is some subtle, life-giving principle in Pink Pills which I do not attempt to fathom. I only knew, like the blind man of old: 'Once I was blind; now I can see!' God, in the mystery of His providence, directed my brother of the A. O. U. W. to me. I took it. I live and rejoice in my health and strength. I have no physical malady save a slight stiffness in my leg due to grippe. I feel as well as in my palmiest days. My prospects are good. All this I greatly attribute to the virtues of Pink Pills for Pale People, 'and now my story is done!' as the nursery ballad runs. If any body should ask confirmation of this tale of mine let him write to me and I shall cheerfully furnish it. The Pink Pills were my rescuer and I'll be their friend and advocate while I live!"

The reporter finally took his leave of Dr. Verrinder, but not without the professor entertaining him to another piano treat, a symphony played with faultless execution and soulful interpretation of the composer's thought.

Calling upon Messrs. A. E. Pilkey & Co., the well-known druggists, the reporter ascertained Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have an enormous sale in Chatham, and that from all quarters come glowing reports of the excellent results following their use. In fact Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are recognized as one of the greatest modern medicines—a perfect blood builder and nerve restorer—curing such diseases as rheumatism, neuralgia, partial paralysis, locomotor ataxia, St. Titus' dance, nervous headache, nervous prostration and the tired feeling resulting therefrom, diseases depending upon humors in the blood, such as scrofula, chronic erysipelas, etc. Pink Pills restore pale and sallow complexion to the glow of health, and are a specific for all the troubles peculiar to the female sex, while in the case of men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork or excesses of whatever nature.

These Pills are manufactured by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., and Brockville, Ont., and are sold in boxes (never in loose form by the dozen or hundred and the public are cautioned against numerous imitations sold in this shape) at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company from either address. The price at which these pills are sold make a course of treatment comparatively inexpensive as compared with other remedies or medical treatment.

Literary Notices.

A WOMAN'S EVANGEL. By Eva Kenney Griffith. Chicago: Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. 1892. Price, $1.25.

This is a temperance story of unusual interest. It describes the ruin of a promising young lawyer, in spite of his wife's love and devotion, by the gradual growth of an appetite for liquor; of the efforts of reformers, the wiles of politicians, the difficulties, disappointments and successes of the workers for temperance. The closing words have in them the ring of prophecy. "There is harmony in Pannona, for all are united in one grand effort to drive the liquor traffic from their beautiful city." Some day, by the help of woman suffrage, they will succeed.

COLUMBUS AND WHAT HE FOUND. By Mary H. Hull. Chicago: Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. 1892. Price, $1.25.

In this charming narrative the wanderings and imaginings, the baffled hopes and unfinished plans of a modern Ulysses are told to children in simple language and with a sincere sentiment of hero-worship. The author has drawn her narrative from Navarette and Las Casas, Irving and Fiske. Her conception of the character of Columbus is noble and inspiring.

Please give attention to the following statement and proposition:

Fully believing that it would be one of the greatest aids to our cause, as has been said again and again in these columns, if THE UNION SIGNAL were more generally read, and being unable to personally canvass all the territory of all the local unions, nearly 10,000 of which are scattered over this country, and desiring your help in this direction, the proposition here outlined is made to all ages and sexes.

NOTE.—To any one, young or old, readers of "Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner" included, who will send us a club of eight new subscribers at one dollar each, we will forward promptly one of our beautiful W. These spoons are both beautiful and valuable, being of solid sterling silver.

REMEMBER, we will send an after-dinner coffee spoon, polished or oxidized, for eight NEW subscribers at one dollar a year.

FOR TEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a similar spoon with gilded bowl.

CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

Write to John J. Byrne, Asst. Passenger Traffic Manager, 723 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., if you are interested in California, and he will send you some reading matter.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions, for preparing and using. At the Sterlingworth Sanitarium of Lakewood, New York, a view of which we published in our columns last week, they are treating consumption successfully by a new method. The treatment is in the hands of a staff of thoroughly competent and skilled physicians aided by a corps of trained nurses, and is free from empiricism. The statement which they make that two weeks' treatment will show that climatic influences do not affect the patient while under treatment, is a startling one, and, if true, will revolutionize the treatment of consumption. We should advise our readers who are suffering from the dread disease, or have friends afflicted, to thoroughly investigate their claims, and to write them for further facts and proofs.

Publisher's Notes.

FROM AN EXCHANGE.

For the children who get "tired" Sunday afternoon, and wish they had something new to do, we have good news. It is in the shape of a book called, "Bright Eyes—Pleasure and Profit for Sunday Afternoon."

On each page are three small pictures and three blank spaces. Each picture illustrates a Scripture verse, and under it is a word of the verse and the name of the book in the Bible from which it is taken. You are to find the texts and write them into the blanks. We can heartily recommend this pleasant "Helper" to our readers. It is arranged by Miss Alice Guernsey, editor of The Young Crusader, and published by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. The Temple, Chicago, Ill. Price 50 cts.

THE MARCH CRUSADER.

"A New President," by Margaret Spencer, is the appropriate title of the opening article for the March number of The Young Crusader.

The second chapter of "Baby Christopher" will be welcomed by the little ones, and an interesting letter from "Merrie Old England," written by Miss Gordon, will be eagerly read by members of the L. T. L.

The Easter program, by Miss Alice Guernsey, the editor, is of especial interest and will be helpful in preparing for the glad Easter day.

Will the boys and girls kindly notice our Easter advertisement of cards and booklets and send early orders to

THE BEST YET!

At this time, when all the world is anxious to learn about Columbus, we are glad to be able to announce that we have just issued the best, simplest and most accurate account of him and his discoveries that has been produced, entitled

Columbus, and What He Found,

BY MRS. MARY H. HULL.

Do not fail to secure a copy without delay! Very desirable for parents and teachers!

Prof. S. R. Winchell, Manager of the National Young Folks' Reading Union, says: "I am placed under renewed obligations to you for the beautiful volume "COLUMBUS, AND WHAT HE FOUND." This seems to me like a successful attempt to tell the story of Columbus so that a child will be attracted by it, and be interested in reading it. I hope it will be persistently pushed so that the parents of children will provide it for their sitting-room table. Where ten persons try to write a book nine fail to produce a work of merit which will endure. Mrs. Hull is the tenth."

Gents:—My family finds that the benefits derived from using your Ventilated Cabinet are incalculable, and yet we've had no sickness, which would make it still more indispensable. No objections whatever attend its use; not only is it absolutely odorless, but actually makes purer the air wherever it is placed.

Mrs. Whitaker's Opinion.

Mrs. A. E. Whitaker, the well-known health writer of Boston, says, in substance, of the Jackson Favorite Waist:

This health waist gives the support of a corset, without unduly compressing the waist and other organs. Women, while they wish to dress and look neatly, sometimes find it impossible to wear corsets while at work, and are obliged to discard them a part of the time. This is not wise or healthful. A good, firm waist, with shoulder straps to help hold up the weight of the clothes, is much better. I have examined all the different waists manufactured and given them a trial as to fit and wearing qualities, and can recommend the Jackson Favorite Waist as comfortable, well-fitting, filling all needed requirements at half the cost of the best Dress Reform Waists.

FIVE HUNDRED CAR-LOADS OF STOVE POLISH.

The product of the two leading manufacturers of Stove Polish in the world, for the year 1892, would load more than ten trains of fifty cars each. Of this amount one firm, J. L. Prescott & Co., manufacturers of Enameline, produced 87,570 gross; and the other, according to published statement, 79,280 gross. Enameline has been on the market only about five years, and the fact that it has already outstripped all competitors, is an evidence of its wonderful popularity.

WHO CAN BEAT IT?

"Ten years in business and not one dissatisfied customer." What a record. Yet this is the experience of Mr. S. F. Leonard, of Chicago, who has supplied seeds for years to many of the readers of this paper. It's a record to be proud of. Mr. Leonard's catalogue this year has all the worthy novelties, as well as the standard seeds. It is worth sending for; you get it free.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway is the only line running solid Vestibuled Electric Lighted and Steam Heated trains between Chicago, Omaha and Sioux City.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company now operates over sixty-one hundred miles of thoroughly equipped road in Illinois, Wisconsin, Northern Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, South and North Dakota.

On all its through lines of travel the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway runs the most perfectly equipped trains of Sleeping, Parlor and Dining Cars and Coaches. The through trains on all its lines are systematically heated by steam. No effort is spared to furnish the best accommodations for the least money, and, in addition, patrons of the road are sure of courteous treatment from its employés.

CHEAP RATES TO THE INAUGURATION.

For the inauguration of Cleveland and Stevenson at Washington on March 4th, excursion tickets, reading via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, "The Picturesque Route," will be placed on sale at the ticket offices of principal railroads of the west, as well as at the ticket offices of the Baltimore and Ohio Company. The fare from Chicago will be $17.50 for the round trip. These tickets will be sold from February 28th to March 3d, inclusive, and will be valid for return journey until March 8th, inclusive.

The Baltimore and Ohio is the shortest route to Washington from nearly all points west. Its trains are vestibuled from end to end, and carry Pullman sleeping cars.

No railroad in America is better equipped than the B. & O. to transport with dispatch safety and comfort, the large crowd which will visit Washington to witness the inauguration ceremonies. Its long experience in transporting crowds to former inaugurations, G. A. R. Encampments, Knights Templar Conclaves, and similar gatherings on an extensive scale, will prove most valuable in arranging for the coming inauguration. For more detailed information as to rates, time of trains, etc., apply to L. S. Allen, Asst. Gen'l Passenger Agent, The Rookery, Chicago, or O. P. McCarty, Asst. Gen'l Passenger Agent, Cincinnati, O.

1,000,000 Tired Out People

are thinking to-day that all they need to make them feel well is "a little rest." It is true that the rest cure is often the best cure, but it is also true that a great many people cannot afford to rest indefinitely. Worse still, the very knowledge that they cannot afford it, seriously interferes with the best use of the rest they have. Too often going to the doctor means that the patient shall stop short, while cares, duties and expenses keep right on. It is highly desirable then that some treatment be found for this numerous class—something that will neither interfere with their business or pleasure. In this respect nothing in the world can compare with Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen. For more than twenty years this well-known agent has made multitudes of run-down, over-worked, nervous and sick people as good as new, and that right at their own homes and occupations. From the 60,000 cases which they have carefully recorded they can give you incontestable proof, doubtless in your own neighborhood. If in need of better health, write them. That is better than "rainbow-chasing" after rest which never comes. Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York and Toronto, Ont.

10 CENTS A DAY. ONE HUNDRED COTTAGES OR TENTS. 10 CENTS A DAY.

HARVEY, ILL.

FORTY-SEVEN ALREADY SPOKEN FOR.

THE CHICAGO INTER-STATE ASSEMBLY has just been located at Harvey in connection with the WORLD'S FAIR TEMPERANCE HEADQUARTERS. It will have regular Chautauqua sessions every summer, and will be the great rallying point for Temperance Workers, Educators and Normal Training Classes. It will be the Prohibition Park of the Mississippi Valley. In connection with it we offer the use of its cottages and tents during the World's Fair period.

LOCATION These cottages and tents are within 1,000 feet of the Great World's Fair Temperance Headquarters, and are immediately adjoining the grounds where the great Auditorium will be constructed in which will be held the great meetings, both during the World's Fair and thereafter each summer. The foremost temperance speakers, and other reformers from all portions of this country and all other countries, are among the speakers engaged. It is on the banks of the Calumet River, as shown by the cut in THE UNION SIGNAL of February 2, last page. They are from 15 to 25 feet above the water, and have perfect natural drainage.

And the TOWN OF HARVEY is itself a temperance marvel. It is not yet 29 months old, has nearly 6,000 population, has built a new house on the average every day since we commenced operations, and 200 houses more. The building operations of the town were never carried on so large a scale before as now, and this camp is located in the neighborhood of its greatest activities.

THE WORLD'S FAIR These cottages and tent lots can be used during the WORLD'S FAIR. They have been on the market but ten days, and 47 are already spoken for. But 100 are now offered. The choice of location is given in the order in which applications are received.

WHAT IS THE COST A complete outfit, which will belong to you and can be used for camping purposes or sold again, will only cost from $130 to $200, according to the kind of furnishings selected. But such an outfit will accommodate eight persons, making the average cost of lodgings for the WORLD'S FAIR less than 10 cents per day, and THEN YOU OWN ALL YOU HAVE PAID FOR WHEN THE SEASON IS OVER.

SPECIAL ADVANTAGES The great World's Fair Hotel with its enormous dining-room, capable of seating 1,000 people at once, will be only 1,000 to 1,500 feet from your tent door. This Hotel has already engaged lodgings for more than 20,000 guests. The attendance at the Assembly meetings during this first year cannot be less than 50,000, a record which has never been made by any other Assembly ever organized during the first year. The Hotel will receive deliveries of fresh meats twice daily and direct from the Stock Yards. It will have its own dairy, and will furnish fresh and pure milk. It has already stored its own ice in abundant quantities and for all purposes. It is within a mile and a half of the largest gardens in the Mississippi Valley; it is on the side of the Fair away from the crowds. It reaches the FAIR GROUNDS with ONE FARE and NO CHANGE OF CARS. It will be in a community made up exclusively of Temperance and Christian people gathered from every portion of this country, and of all others. It will be under a management experienced and successful, and which has never made a failure.

TERMS The ONE HUNDRED COTTAGES OR TENTS are offered for sale for $20 down and $20 per month, until $100 is paid. Then the balance, whatever it may be, can be paid when the buyers are on the ground, and determine what they want above this first item of cost, which is uniform in all cases.

REMEMBER You have choice of location in the order in which your application reaches us. Write at once and secure your next choice, or send a telegram if you prefer, and we will hold a place for you until you can investigate further, if you desire. Address

A WORD TO THE WISE.
CERTAIN ADVERTISEMENTS FROM TRADE RIVALS, who fear the phenomenal success of

Van Houten's Cocoa

in America, contain innuendoes against it, and appeal to the authority of Dr. SYDNEY RINGER, Professor of Medicine at University College, London. Author of the Standard "Handbook of Therapeutics."

This eminent physician ACTUALLY writes as follows:—

"From the careful analyses of Professor ATTFIELD and others, I am satisfied that Messrs. VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA is in no way injurious to health, and that it is decidedly more nutritious than other Cocoas.—It is certainly "Pure" and highly digestible.

The quotations in certain advertisements from my book on Therapeutics are quite misleading and cannot possibly apply to VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA."

The false reflection on VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA is thus effectually repelled and the very authority cited to injure it, has thereby been prompted to give it a very handsome testimonial.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The National Electric Light Association met in St. Louis, February 28.

The League of American Wheelmen have just closed their annual meeting at Philadelphia.

The seventeenth annual session of the Iowa Temperance Alliance convened at Des Moines, Tuesday.

The whisky trust investigation by the House sub-committee is being slowly but surely continued.

Preparations for the Presidential inaugural ceremonies at Washington have been going on all the week.

The Reading combine or coal trust, a monopoly in great disrepute, went down with a crash last week.

The Pennsylvania Woman's Suffrage Association held a conference and mass-meeting at Harrisburg last Tuesday.

Mrs. Mary A. Lease has been appointed a member of the state board of charities by the Populist governor of Kansas.

A dispatch from London announces the death of Mr. John Pettie, R. A., the well-known painter, at the age of fifty-three.

The supreme court of Kansas decided, February 25, that the Republican house is the legal house of representatives in Kansas.

The National Society of Daughters of the American Revolution met in Continental Congress at Washington, D. C., February 22.

A large delegation of prominent Evanston citizens went to Springfield, Ill., Monday, to combat the proposed repeal of their prohibition law.

The distillery influences are quietly at work to prevent the passage of a resolution in the Illinois legislature for the investigation of the whisky trust.

As reported from Washington, February 25, the indications are that the Hawaiian treaty will not be acted upon during the present session of Congress.

M. Le Royer, president of the French senate, has resigned, and Jules Ferry, a former Premier of France, was elected to the vacant position, February 24.

An important ordinance subjecting the sweat shops to the inspection of the health commissioners, and to a license fee, was passed by the Chicago city council, February 23.

The usual proclamation of the outgoing President, calling an extra session of the United States Senate, March 4, to receive the new President has been issued by President Harrison.

A report to the state department by Frank H. Mason, consul at Frankfort, shows that nearly half of German wheat importations last year, amounting to 23,065,795 bushels, were purchased from the United States.

Among the measures introduced in the Michigan legislature last week were bills to prohibit prize-fighting, to provide woman's suffrage in the city of Detroit and to forbid the manufacture and the sale of cigarettes.

Mass-meetings were held and the action of the New Jersey legislature in passing a bill which gives undue license to track racing, was freely condemned by the ministers and reputable citizens of that state last Sunday.

THE annexation of Hawaii seems assured. The W. C. T. U. is ready for the event, and delegates from the territory of Hawaii will doubtless be present at the National Convention in Chicago next June.

MRS. CAROLINE VAN PETTEN, the friend who expected to return from Japan with Miss West, arrived in Chicago a few days ago, bringing Miss West's personal effects and the wonderful bell made from tobacco pipes. The latter was Miss West's suggestion to Mr. Sen Tsuda, who had the bell cast in time to be tolled at her funeral in Tokio, December 17. White-ribboners will give Mrs. Van Petten a warm welcome because of her devotion to our lamented friend.

IN the recent Liverpool election the good and true organized what they called the Crusade party, and women turned out in great numbers, for they have the municipal ballot there, so that between the women and the good men such a clearing up was given to the city of Liverpool as it has not known since it was founded. In that word "Crusade party" lives the spirit of the great uprising in 1874, from which has come all that women have wrought since then in the name of God and Home and Every Land.

ONE of the most hopeful signs of the steady advance of prohibition sentiment is to be found among collegiate young men. The students of the University of Chicago have organized a body, modeled after the United States House of Representatives. All political parties are represented, the Republican, Democratic and Independent having fifteen members each, while the Prohibitionists have twenty-seven. Both the president and the clerk are Prohibitionists, and it is safe to conclude that strong temperance measures will be carried out.

DURING the fiscal year, ending July 1, 1892, there were forty-four cigarettes manufactured in this country for each man, woman and child in the United States. The total number, according to the internal revenue statement just published, was nearly 3,000,000,000. Accurately speaking, 2,892,982,840 paper cigars were made in the United States during the twelvemonth, an increase of 214,444,000 over the previous year. The tremendous rate at which the consumption of tobacco in this form is growing is seen from the fact that in 1884-85 the number of cigarettes produced did not much exceed 1,000,000,000, the exact figures being 1,058,658,280. In other words, nearly three cigarettes are smoked in the United States to-day where one was consumed seven years ago. Comparatively few—perhaps 100,000 packages—are imported from Turkey, Russia and Cuba.

WE talk of the malign power of those who drink, to perpetuate injurious social customs and vicious legislation, but we must begin to think and speak of the immeasurably more blighting power of such persons to perpetuate themselves. The moderate drinker of to-day is far more likely to have a drunkard for his son or daughter than the total abstinence man, and the mother, who takes alcohol into her system, on a physician's prescription or otherwise, often brings an unspeakable curse upon the hapless and innocent. The awful laws of cause and effect involved in the subject of hygiene, heredity, and pre-natal influences, involving "the sacred right of every child to be well born," ought to be made the subjects of reverent investigation by us and the results sent to our local unions everywhere. Meetings of women, to be addressed on this subject, should be a feature of our work; physicians should be enlisted and educated to a clearer discernment of their duty. We are proud of the record which women physicians are making in this regard, and that our National and state union furnish a field of marvelous usefulness to motherly women of that guild who speak and write upon the sacred theme, least understood but most vitally related to the possession of an untainted body and an undiseased soul.

SCHOOLS which receive a limited number of young men to train them for the profession (?) of gambling are among the latest additions to the educational forces of Chicago. The Rev. O. P. Gifford, pastor of the Immanuel Baptist church, who has been foremost in combating the gambling evil in Chicago, has discovered these schools, which for the sum of forty dollars will in four weeks prepare the bright student for a life of vice. That such schools can flourish and receive applications from two hundred and sixty young men desiring to enter, is a speaking comment on the moral condition of Chicago, which not only furnishes food for reflection, but should spur the lagging energies of its reform movers.

WE desire to emphasize the notice of self-denial week, printed upon this page, and to impress upon our local unions everywhere the importance of observing this season. There is abundant reason for urging the adoption of this plan for the advancement of our work upon every individual member of the W. C. T. U. The benefits to be derived from this concerted action on the part of our membership the world over are greater than a mere superficial observer would suppose. It has been said, and with good reason, that we love most that for which we sacrifice most. This may explain in part the devotion of the W. C. T. U. woman to the cause symbolized by the white ribbon. Among all the cosmopolitan following of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, from the president down to the most "heroically obscure" worker in its rank and file, it would be hard to find one who had not made some sacrifice for it. The purpose of self-denial week, as instituted by the World's Convention, is not merely the collecting of dollars and cents (though our leaders would be last to minify the advantages of money in carrying the temperance gospel to the nations), but it is, first, the strengthening and tightening of the cord which binds each to the other, and all to a consecrated purpose.

THE women's branch of the World's Congress begins on the 15th of May next and is intended as an international re-union of representative women not for the purpose of advocating any one clause, promoting any one doctrine or advancing any one propaganda, but for the purpose of bringing together the leaders in all the world's organizations of women throughout the world. It is also desired to convene in this Congress not only delegates of organizations of women but also of women not affiliated with others in any organized relation if they have attained distinction in any line of helpful activity. It is believed that such a congress of women will be able to represent the history of woman's development and progress, and her personal status as a candidate of the future in the world of art, science and industry and a potent influence in the civil as well as social and domestic life. The Woman's National Council of the United States has been authorized to "work up" this Congress of women which is the first of the one hundred congresses to be held during the year. As is well known Mrs. Sewall, of Indianapolis, is president of the council of women. Rachel Foster Avery is secretary, her post-office address being, Somerton, Philadelphia, Penn., and Mrs. Avery is in correspondence with leading women in all parts of the world, and to her all questions should be addressed. With these two ladies are associated as a committee of the World's Congress, Dr. Sarah Hackett Stevenson, Dr. Julia Holmes Smith, of Chicago, Miss Frances E. Willard, and Mrs. E. B. Harbert, of Evanston. During the absence of Miss Willard, Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, of the Woman's Temple, Chicago, takes her place. The entire Congress is under the supervision of Mrs. Potter Palmer, and Mrs. Charles Henrotin, of Chicago, who are the two chieftains of the woman's department of the World's Columbian Exposition. We hope this statement may be carefully noted and that all women wishing well to their kind may take the occasion to be present and to contribute to the success of the Women's International Congress of 1893. Remember the date, May 15.

OPEN THE WINDOWS AND LET IN THE LIGHT.

BY REV. J. P. HUTCHINSON.

Why sit in darkness and sorrow and gloom,
With everything cheerful removed from the room?
Why be shut in with your trouble and care
Or give yourself up to the power of despair?
God sends us trouble and trial and pain,
But does not intend they should ever remain;
So banish the darkness and gloom of the night;
Throw open the windows and let in the light.

God sends us the sunshine as well as the rain;
He sends us the pleasure as well as the pain;
Why should we shut out the message of love
Flashed to our hearts from the calmness above?
No sin is in tears that in tenderness flow
When the weight of His chastening hand we know;
The sin is in sorrow detained in its flight;
So open the windows and let in the light.

The hearts that are miserly, callous and hard
All entrances locked and bolted and barred,
That plunder the poor, the widows oppress,
That heeds not the cry of a child in distress;
That say, whatever of wrong there may be,
"Why should I trouble? 'tis nothing to me";
Such heart is as one that is dead in His sight,
Oh, open the windows and let in the light.

Minds there are haunted by ghosts that should be Forever expelled from the minds of the free;
Prejudice,—cruel, relentless and blind
To all that is gentle and lovely and kind;
Ignorance,—crafty and vulgar and low;
Pride, with its haughtiness, coarseness and show—
Such spectres love darkness, but vanish outright
When you open the windows and let in the light.

Yes, open the windows and let in the stream
Which banishes shadow and phantom and dream;
Yes, open the windows and out there will go
The ghosts, the ghouls and the ogres of woe;
Admit the sweet, flower-laden breezes of heaven
And list to the songs of the birds which are given;
Banish the blackness, the burden, the blight,
Yes, open the windows and let in the light.

ONE LONE WOMAN.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

There was an unusual stir around a certain tenement house on Vine street one sultry summer night several years ago.

Vine street was lined with tenement houses, and as for vines there were none, nor was there shade of tree or shrub. But there were plenty of people, and it took but a few minutes to bring together quite a crowd in front of the door through which a policeman with two or three women had just passed.

At length he appeared, and the women could be seen in the doorway, standing with shawls over their heads.

"Well, what about it?" asked a man who had been waiting on the steps.

"The clothes 're his, surely, but she don't believe he's drownded himself. She says he ain't in the river," replied the policeman.

A murmur ran through the crowd. "She don't believe he's drownded," and some one added, "she's so close mouthed you wouldn't know it if she did."

"If Joe Dudley's made way with himself it's a small loss. He drinks up all he earns, and more too," said another voice.

The policeman said of course they would drag the river in the morning, and then he went away.

As there was nothing further to see, not even the clothes which had been found and brought to the man's home, the people slowly followed his example. All but Mrs. Collins, who had been on more friendly terms than the other neighbors with Mrs. Dudley. She stayed a little longer vainly endeavoring to sound the depths of this calamity.

"What makes you think he ain't drownded?" she persisted. "You know he's been off two or three days, and there was his clothes on the river bank. If he ain't in the river where can he be?"

"I don't know," replied Mrs. Dudley, wearily, "but I don't believe he's made way with himself. It wouldn't be like him to do it."

"But where is he then?" demanded Mrs. Collins, her voice rising with her perplexity. "It looks dreadful queer for you to set here and not tell. If 'twas my man I'd be rousin' the city, I would."

"Yes, I know you would, but I—I think maybe he'll be back again, and I can't bear to set folks talking. I hope they won't come around the house. I wish they'd leave me to do my work in peace!" and the poor little woman looked into her neighbor's face with appealing eyes.

"Well, perhaps you'd like to have me go," and Mrs. Collins rose indignantly. "I guess you know where he is. If you don't, you take it cool, I must say. Maybe when he's found and brought home you'll be glad of a little help. Well, I don't stay where I ain't wanted," and hesitating at the door for an invitation to remain, which was not given, she withdrew.

Then Joe Dudley's wife bowed her head upon the table. She knew her husband had not drowned himself, for two days before she discovered that he had taken his best suit from the closet where it hung. It was his old work suit which had been found. Her own little hoard of rent money had also been taken. Joe had threatened to leave her, when, less than a week before, she had begged him to keep away from the saloons and help support the family.

"If you don't stop teasin' I'll go off. Then what would you do?" he had said, as though he were an indispensable blessing!

Yes, everything tended to strengthen her belief that he had simply slipped away from "family cares," leaving his poor patched clothes on the river bank to deceive the public.

There they were now on the floor, and there was a sort of individuality about them, as though they would very soon get up and demand "a good square meal, now, an' no foolin'." Mrs. Dudley shivered as she rose and hung them them in the little back entry. Then she went into the bedroom and looked at her two children—Isabel and Harry—both sound asleep, and happy, she hoped, in their dreams.

"We'll get along some way," said she to herself, feeling, in spite of circumstances, a strangely welcome sense of freedom. Then she sat down and worked steadily until daybreak.

The next day the river was dragged without results, and the neighbors concluded that Joe had, as they expressed it, "skipped!"

Meanwhile Mrs. Briggs, a benevolent lady, and a "visitor" from the church of which Mrs. Dudley was a member, called. Mrs. Briggs was an excellent woman, but her method of bestowing charity partook of the nature of massage treatment. It was good for the patient but severe. She questioned Mrs. Dudley as to her resources, her earnings and her hopes for the future; gave good advice for training the children and wrote their names and ages carefully in her note book.

"Isabel, ten, Harry, eight," she repeated. "We shall make them some clothes right away. And I've got the promise of a year's coal from the city benevolent society, and Mrs. Vance will fill a pail with pieces for you every day. She keeps boarders you know, and you'll get good, fresh food enough to nearly keep you. You're a poor lone woman, and you've got a hard row to hoe; but the Lord'll provide for you a good deal better than that shiftless man ever did, and I shall keep my eye on you too!"

"You're kind, I'm sure," said Mrs. Dudley, "and I thank you. It's a little hard, but the children will grow up, and we shall get along." She was excited and tired after the "visitor" left, but there was a glow of hope and a strength of spirit which made trials look small. This friendly interest on the part of the church was a wholesome tonic.

Mrs. Dudley's work was finishing "uppers" for a large shoe manufactory. After the machines had done all they could, there was a bit of finishing which must be done "by hand" before the sole could be added. So every day she did that little on dozens and dozens of pairs. Every night the children carried them back to the shop, bringing home an equally heavy load for the coming day.

That night at twilight they came in bending under their burden as usual, to find their mother humming a little tune as she prepared their frugal supper. This meant a rift of sunshine in their cloudy sky, and their hearts responded at once—child fashion—for they really could not mourn their father's absence. And their mother wisely took them into her confidence while they ate, thus inspiring the first definite ambition of their lives.

"The church people are going to help us," said she, "so you must be good and let them see you deserve it. And we'll work, yes, indeed, we will! and we'll save, and by and by maybe we can move out of this dreadful street."

Days, weeks and months rolled away, and one day Mrs. Briggs was shocked to hear that Mrs. Dudley had "bought a house." She hurried to the tenement quite indignant for had she not been a sort of "mother confessor" to this lone woman?

"I hear you've bought a house, Mrs. Dudley," she began; "I wonder, after all I've done for you if you've been deceiving me, and running in debt; or have you property all unbeknown to me?"

The little woman's dark, thin face flushed, but she snipped the linen thread from an "upper" and laid it in the basket before replying. Then she said with a smile,

"I'll tell you all about it. You have helped me Mrs. Briggs, and I'll never forget it, for if you hadn't I might have stayed in this miserable place all my life. But I didn't mean to bring up my children here. There's too much roughness and drinking. So when Mr. Jewett began to build a bigger addition to his house, I asked him what he would take for the old kitchen. He's interested in the children—being Sunday-school superintendent—and he said I should have it for nothing if I'd pay the expense of moving it off. So then I told him what I wanted to do and he bought me an acre of land on Sunset Hill with the money I've saved since he went away. I'm going to move the old kitchen up there, and that's my 'house,' and that's going to be my home."

"For the land sakes!" ejaculated the visitor. "You'll freeze, and the wind'll blow you over the cliffs. What a place that is for a lone woman."

Mrs. Dudley actually laughed, "I'll risk it!" said she "I'll have my boy and girl where there's better air than we can find on Vine street, if the Lord's willing. Mr. Jewett says that hill's bound to be covered with houses before a great while, and it ain't half a mile from here if it does seem so far out."

Mrs. Briggs left her protégé in a somewhat dazed condition. She had been helping the helpless a good many years; and, like too many embodied charities, rather enjoyed feeding people who were satisfied to sit still and hold their mouths open!

In due time the absurd little "house" was taken up the hill and perched on four piles of stone, for Mrs. Dudley could not yet afford cellar or foundation. Her acre of land was a bit of pasture, whereon grew goldenrod, and mullein, and tangles of blackberry bushes. But oh! the magnificent outlook! Mountains and valleys, forests and far away lake, lovely day-dawns and brilliant sunsets, "these," she said, "were all thrown in!"

Here she set up her dilapidated "Lares and Penates," and went on with her incessant work upon "uppers," with new hope in her heart and a song upon her lips.

Five or six years slipped quietly away bringing many changes. Sunset Hill had become a part of the city, and was dotted all over with lovely homes and well-kept grounds. Mrs. Dudley had built a tiny cottage with five rooms, and her first "house" had assumed its original character as an "L." Isabel was in the city High School, standing well in her class, and ambitious to become a teacher. Harry, with less love for books, had entered Mr. Jewett's employ, and was a thorough-going, home-loving "business-boy." And Mrs. Dudley was sensible enough to enjoy these well-earned rewards of incessant toil and watch-care, which even Mrs. Briggs declared "she deserved if ever a woman did."

But one cold night as the three sat in their cozy sitting-room, the pleasant monotony of their lives was rudely broken. A man's face suddenly appeared at the window. Isabel looked up from her books with a cry of affright, and Harry sprang to his feet. But Mrs. Dudley had seen and recognized the face, and her own grew white. "Stay here, children, I'll go to the door," she said, and as she opened it, Joe, her long absent husband, staggered into the little kitchen, sick, ragged, penniless—the prodigal returned.

Mrs. Briggs was the one who carried the news to the Ladies' Aid Society a day or two later.

"And the worst of it is," said she, after giving the facts, "that woman has taken him right in, and is going to take care of him as long as he lives."

"How can she? I never would do it." "After all she's done to get that little home!" "I would have sent him to the poor-house where she would have gone long ago if he'd had his way," exclaimed the sympathetic, but indignant ladies.

"And she has had Dr. Thrall up to see him," continued Mrs. Briggs. "He says the man can't live long—that's one comfort—but Mrs. Dudley will have everything done for him, as much as though he was a saint. Yes, and if he dies, you mark my word, she'll put a stone to his grave. I get so tried with that woman!"

But "that woman" had a quietly stubborn way of settling her own affairs: and in this case her application of the Christ-law of forgiveness was made with an original self-depreciation. Joe was taken care of, body and soul, and in due time buried most tenderly. Even Mrs. Briggs' prediction came true, for he had "a stone to his grave!"

For one, I am glad to have known this story of facts and to think that the old-fashioned poets had a subtile knowledge of possibilities when they called women "angels" and "ministering spirits."

Norwich, Conn.

One of the noblest sayings of Abraham Lincoln has come to light in his life by Herndon. It is as follows: "Die when I may, I want it said of me, by those who know me best, that I always plucked the thistle and planted a flower where I thought a flower would grow."

REFORM MOVEMENTS—HOW CAN THEY UNITE?

BY ELI F. RITTER.

From away back the distillers, brewers, wine-producers and saloon-keepers have been in harmony, and have each been a part of a common enterprise. This organization is now so thoroughly completed, with its signals of alarm so well understood that the display of its red lights on the mountains at any hour in the night will rally the clans from sea to sea.

Every distiller, brewer, wine-producer and saloon-keeper is in politics, individually and as a member of the consolidated body. They are in politics for the protection and promotion of their business. The result of the last election the country over will put the whole liquor vote in the Democratic party for the future, and nothing that the Republicans can do will reclaim any of that vote, for the Republican party is not in a condition to offer anything to anybody. The liquor vote has gone from it, the temperance element is alienated, not a party leader of commanding influence is left, and a record is made of disregard and betrayal of its promises to the moral sentiment of the country. "Behold, the feet of the young men who carried Ananias out are at the door."

The liquor business, by its policy and course has succeeded. The temperance people, by their policy and course have failed. The liquor traffic will continue with more and more ability and courage to force the fighting and complete the conquest. It remains to be seen whether the church people and temperance people will pursue the same King John policy or whether they will try some other. I think there is a large number of candid people, who have given mere casual consideration to the question, that have thought all effort should be consolidated against the saloon business; but these people overlook the fact that no attack can be made upon this branch of the business or at this point in the line without attacking the whole business and drawing the full weight of the whole force. Every branch of the business and the consolidated organization has been fully warned and has fully anticipated this attack, so that instead of this being the weak place in the enemy's line, it is the strongest point. Temperance people are right who say that if you destroy the saloon that would be a death-blow to the whole business. Distillers, brewers, wine-producers, are just as thoroughly informed of that fact as the temperance people and have massed their force and determined to protect the saloons at all hazards. The facts are, as every body will come to see, that any attack at all on behalf of the temperance people will bring on a general engagement. The enemy is not to be surprised nor caught napping nor deceived nor compromised with, but must be overcome.

We can often learn as much from the enemy as from our friends. The church members and good citizens must continue to teach morality and resist immorality. Great things have been accomplished in this direction, but there are some phases of this work that have become so ludicrous and inconsistent that this whole line of work is in disrepute and has almost ceased to have any effect or maintain any advocacy. For many years religious bodies have felt constrained to say something upon the subject of the liquor traffic; but the policy of firing a volley of resolutions at this business and then running, has become so disgraceful and humiliating that every body has become ashamed of it. The liquor traffic is not in the church. It requires no courage to make war on the liquor traffic when the liquor traffic is not there, nor in range. This question has reached a point in the evolution where neither the ministry nor religious bodies can say a word on the subject that is not out of harmony and antagonistic to three political parties,—and the whole Christian sentiment of the country will have to be still or join a new party.

There is yet in the hearts of the American people enough of honest purpose and courage to meet this emergency when they come to see it as it is. The condition of affairs is now such that any man who will look can see that no Republican or Democrat in any way antagonizing the liquor business can have any hope in his party. The same is true of the People's party. It will not do for the Prohibition partisans to become mere partisan bigots and declare that there is no other name under heaven by which the country can be saved. The name has served a great purpose. I have sometimes thought that the name itself has done half the work. The word "Democracy," as applied to a political party, has come to mean opposition to progress and total depravity on moral questions. The word "Republican," as applied to a party organization, has come to mean nothing at all. The word "Populist," as applied to a political party, has had a short career, but long enough to become understood as a synonym for mere dicker and trade in politics. The word "Prohibition," as applied to a political party, has not required any explanation. It has been sometimes said that it means "fanatic," "crank," "fool," etc. But whatever may have been the efforts to define the meaning of the term, every body has understood that it means real square, honest, uncompromising war against what every body knows to be the most alarming evil of the day. I desire to emphasize the expression that the name "Prohibition," in my opinion, has done a wonderful work in sounding an alarm, frightening the enemy, stimulating thought and securing investigation. But while all this is true, I think the name has had its day and served its purpose, and I am ready for a change in name. I hope I will not be understood as being timid and apologizing for this statement of my views. I am opposed to fusion or compromise or dicker, and I do not think there is any hurry in this serious business. I do not think there is any hope for consolidation with any other party. Any consolidation or fusion would contemplate the giving up of something that ought not be given up, and the acceptance of something that ought not be accepted. The leadership in the Populist party induced that organization to keep silent on the temperance question in order to get liquor votes. The destiny of that party has been fixed by that cast given to it. There is no use to waste time in negotiating with that organization. The last national platform, adopted by the Prohibition party, was never surpassed in the nation for honest, intelligent and comprehensive declaration. My only objection to it was that there was too much of it. A political party cannot undertake to specify everything that ought to be done.

I think that the temperance people ought to encourage and attend conferences and meetings, to which men, regardless of party affiliations, are invited, to consider what shall be done for temperance. Prohibition partisans ought to be there, not as partisans, but as earnest, candid, generous and fair-minded citizens; not to talk partisan politics nor to work schemes, but to aid in bringing together all the people who think alike on the one great question. I believe that such conferences will be numerously held, will grow in interest, and the way will be cleared thereby for such a combination as will yet sweep the country and drive out the enemy. Meanwhile, under the present name, we must continue the work that has been conducted by the Prohibition party, which is in the direct line, and the only work there is in the line of the ultimate success desired by all good citizens.

GONE TO HER REST.

BY JOHN DUNCAN.

Jennie Casseday is dead. That is, peacefully as the light of day declines, her beautiful spirit left the wasted body and went to its rest and everlasting home. This was at the hour of half-past three in the afternoon of Wednesday, February 8, 1893.

"Job had no point over her," was the remark of one who knew Jennie Casseday well, and who saw her through her last illness, noticing her unflagging faith and patience so that not so much as a suggestion of complaint ever entered her thoughts or fell from her lips, though it was evident to all present during the closing days of her career on earth that her sufferings were excruciating. But it is all past, and whilst she has gone on she has left behind a priceless memory, a sweet song to reach and live in the heart rather than a sermon for men's heads.

In the year 1840, Jennie Casseday was born in Louisville in a house occupying part of the ground where the Masonic Temple now stands. She came of a stock of people noted for their generous impulse and superior gifts and graces of mind; and both her father and mother were among the pillars of the early Presbyterian church of Louisville; so that having grown up with this body she has remained with it to the end, and to the point of becoming one of its loveliest ornaments.

Jennie Casseday was little more than a baby when her mother died. Samuel Casseday, her father, was one of the best known of the merchants of Louisville in his day, and he was in a position to give, as he did, his family every advantage. In due course Mr. Casseday moved from Fourth and Jefferson to Chestnut, between Center and Sixth streets, the handsome residence there being on the beautiful elevated lot on the north side of the street. It was here, amidst brightest Christian surroundings and associations, that Jennie Casseday's girlhood years were spent; and it was also whilst here that, just as the time young womanhood was dawning, the accident, as the event was termed, occurred which turned her career in the wonderful course in which it has been run. Thus early she was made a physical invalid in order, as it would seem, that her mind and heart might be the more brightened. Be that as it may, the results are extraordinary, and justify the search for adequate cause beyond the common. Jennie Casseday's whole working life has been given to doing good, and to planning that good might be done to others, the poor and the friendless forming the special objects of her untiring interest.

The individual, that by her departure has thus made many mourners—for her true friends are all over the world—was as cheery a soul as ever lived. Hers was a joyous nature, and her heart was as a bright light that only death could extinguish; her sense of humor which, like all her other senses, was very fine and keen, staying with her down to the very edge of the dark waters. This largeness, this broad point of contact with everything human, was a chief secret of Jennie Casseday's power and capacity as an organizer and manager. Far too few of us, in dealing with our fellows, remember that God made man in his own image, and that therefore the broader we are in all proper human sympathies, the nearer we are to the Divine.

That the cloud during many years of Jennie Casseday's life was gloriously illumined is no proof that at first it was not very black. It was, and the way to the full, clear light and steady faith that in due time came was through much sorrow and trial. There was at the very outset the active young brain; there were the fresh aspirations; all were present, but all had to be turned into unusual channels. The wonder of wonders is that this was done without a trace of the morbid in heart or head. But so it was. Little by little, one by one, the outlets came. Her work in charity extended over a period of about thirty years, her most widely-known organization being the flower mission.

Besides, let it here be noted, to add to her difficulties, she has been during most of these years in the physically helpless condition of being unable, unassisted, to leave her bed. Thus restricted, she yet, in addition to all her flower-mission work, which steadily went on enlarging, was the founder and maker in Louisville of the Training School for Nurses; the Jennie Casseday Infimary, also of this city, and now a firmly established institution, is of her inspiring, and many a tired woman in long years to come will think of her and call her "blessed" out of memories of "Rest Cottage." No one in Louisville would ask what was "Rest Cottage." It was, indeed, it may be said for the information of some away from here, a place of real rest for those who in the city of Miss Casseday's birth most needed rest and were least likely to be able to get it on their own motion. It was not a charity. It was a pay place—the pay part being in the form rather than in the fact—to which girls who had to make their own way in the working walks of life could go, and in a beautiful country retreat—having all the accompaniments of a quiet Christian home—for a time leave behind and forget all toil, and the shop and the counter, and even the schoolroom, in its most poorly paid departments. It were idle to attempt to tell of the many ways in which Jennie Casseday gave the helping hand or the cup of cold water, illustrating at every point of the journey the relation of the mortal to the immortal, the superiority of mind over body, the relation of the spirit to its mere temporal and temporary abode, and being, as this good woman was, in the midst of it all and through innumerable trials the focal point of countless, unnamed charities and blessings.

The amount of work inseparable from these various services was enormous, but the imperial will and heart which were hers by God's gift, as she herself would always say, enabled her to keep up with it all. Her correspondence was very large, but with her own frail hand she did every part of it, and nothing in this line was ever slighted, neglected or put off. Her books are posted to date, and she is gone. A life given to care for others is at an end as to the worry, but it will be long before the story is all told.

In all the relations of life Jennie Casseday has been the same noble Christian; tolerant of the honest opinions and real rights of others, quietly and unfalteringly true to her own faith, a friend without deviation or shadow of turning, she is both a lesson and an inspiration to all whose good fortune it was to know her.

Jennie Casseday's two sisters, Mrs. W. T. McElroy and Mrs. John Duncan, were by her side unremittingly during the closing hours of her life; and this separation by death is the first parting between Jennie Casseday and Fannie C. Duncan. All their lives they have been as one, laboring together with singleness of mind and heart; for when, in 1883, Miss Fannie Casseday and Mr. John Duncan were married, there was no interruption of the perfect harmony between the two sisters, nor has there ever been. At the cottage at 216 East Chestnut street, Louisville, Kentucky, where Jennie Casseday has lived with Mr. and Mrs. Duncan, her work has been carried on, and from there her body was taken to its place of quiet in the grave, her spirit, the immortal being, having gone to its home in the Heaven of that God she loved so well.

The question will surely be often asked, what was the secret of this woman's power? In a sense, during Jennie Casseday's own life, this was an interrogatory that more than once forced itself upon the attention even in her presence; and good Christian that she was, and simple-hearted and sincere as she invariably appeared, she of course gave all the merit to the Master. But the means here on the way to the beautiful end, as in the greatest of all cases of the kind, was through suffering; and her order of suffering was not, and should never be confounded with, the suffering of the stoic. Hers was the hopeful fortitude of faith in an ever-living Redeemer. The world knew this, and so people of all kinds and conditions were drawn to Jennie Casseday. Never was such a gathering seen in Louisville —not many like gatherings have ever appeared or will ever appear on earth—as that which was assembled on Friday, February 10, 1893, at Warren Memorial church on the occasion of the funeral services there of Jennie Casseday. It never occurred to any one to think who sat next in the pew on that occasion, for side by side might then be seen the plain sun-bonnet and the finished production of the fashionable milliner. In her life and in her death Jennie Casseday furnished an illustration not second even to that of the great St. Paul of the possibilities of a genuine Christianity entering into and controlling the life.

SHALL THE UNITED STATES BREAK THE LAWS OF STATES?

BY SARAH A. M'CLEES.

[This interesting article seems an appropriate place for mentioning the origin of the department for soldiers and sailors in the National W. C. T. U. Miss Frances E. Willard was visiting in a southern home when she met a beautiful and accomplished young lady, who was a near relative of an army officer. Miss Willard was speaking of the many different departments of the National Union, when this young lady exclaimed with earnestness and emotion, "Oh, I wish you'd add one more department for the soldiers. My brother is a soldier." An immediate endeavor was made to enlist the young lady in active work along this line, and through her to secure the coöperation of influential people connected with the army and navy. But this not proving practicable, Miss Willard recommended in her annual address at Louisville, in 1883, the appointment of a superintendent of gospel work among soldiers and sailors. Said Miss Willard, "It seems like poetic justice that a pure and gentle girl, tenderly interested to protect her brother from the bad habits so often induced by army life, should have been the procuring cause of this beneficent department of the W. C. T. U."—EDS.]

THE ARMY CANTEEN.

The plea for introduction of the canteen in the United States army, by legislative authority, was based upon the recommendations of army officers; best opinions in favor of its establishment, have been by no means universal. General Sheridan, it is well known, was utterly opposed to the system, and so are many others; some prominent and thoughtful officers occupy neutral ground, being willing to make the experiment of changing from the sutler's stores, because of the most palpable evils under the old plan. A large majority of honorable senators in the debate on the subject in the 51st Congress, agreed that if Congress should appropriate money to provide its soldiers with refreshments and social amusements, it should not at the same time make provision to supply them with intoxicating liquors; it was also very strongly set forth in the debate, by that distinguished and able senator, Eugene Hale, and those who voted with him for the Amendment, that it would be a scandal if the United States government should directly or indirectly engage in the traffic; it was clearly shown that the government, in its paternal capacity was not only authorized to consider the moral welfare of its wards—the army and navy—but that it was also, an imperative duty to legislate in Congress, for the highest good of the men who are being educated and trained, at the expense of government to protect the nation in its times of peril from civil strife or foreign invasion.

It was argued by Senator Frye that it was very offensive to have the United States government actually violating the laws of the state of Maine, and with perfect impunity, because the state has no jurisdiction over the "barracks," and although the gain was made by an application of the prohibitory law in that state, yet it was not made operative in the Togus Soldiers' Home. To illustrate the power of government, it was stated that President Harrison had prohibited the wine and beer canteen at Fort Washington when an appeal was made to him on behalf of the militia of the District of Columbia.

After two years' trial of the new system, candid investigators are prepared to denounce the plan a failure. Our own women, living in states where government exercises such supervision over the enlisted troops, have never been blind to the evils of coöperation in sale of intoxicants. Mrs. Stevens, of Maine, uttered this sentiment in the beginning: "We consider the canteen system in the United States army a backward step, and know that our children's children will not easily believe that the United States government furnished liquor to its own soldiers;" and Maine's motto is, "No flag waving above a government canteen or soldiers' home with a beer saloon attached."

In Nebraska there are four forts, a soldiers' home and many G. A. R. posts. They also have Indian troops. Says our state W. C. T. U. superintendent, who had visited the forts: "It makes my blood curdle to see the enlisted man in United States' uniform, dealing out liquor to his comrades and that at the instigation of our government. The Indian troops share abundantly its use."

Chaplains and good people generally concede that the canteen is a failure because there is no less vice and no diminution of drunkenness. Officers and their wives, whether total abstainers or not, are desirous to suppress drinking habits among the enlisted men. The very change of name adopted by army officials from canteen to post-exchange, indicates an improved public sentiment, compelling its defenders to make the system less offensive. But, those who look beyond the surface, know that the new designation will not make it any more respectable.

"Colonel H. C. Corbin, Assistant Adjutant General, U. S. A., calls attention to an apparent restlessness among the rank and file of the army and says: "A cause of restlessness is traced to the excesses of the exchange, the saloon feature of which is not productive of good, and should be done away with without further experiment. The sale of beer, superintended by a commissioned officer and served by non-commissioned officers and soldiers, is not conducive to discipline nor is it a picture that can be submitted to the people for approval. The men who drink, spend the greater portion of their money for beer. The credit system brings them to the pay-table with little or no money due. This takes all heart out of them and makes them quite ready to ask their discharge and try some other calling. . . . The injury done by the saloon or the exchange to the colored and Indian soldiers is more marked than with the white. It is noted that in many cases tried by summary court the specification is founded on drunkenness in or about the exchange-saloon. Its longer existence is not fair to the reputation of the army, and if persisted in will do a far-reaching injury."

Let me give the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL the testimony of other army people, among the conservatives:

"The canteen is the drink shop; the exchange is the store. At least this distinction is always made in conversation here.

"The management of the post-exchange at Fort McIntosh, Texas, has caused for some time considerable argument among the enlisted men at this garrison. Without doubt the exchanges at some posts, in regard to the sale of beer, are an injury to the enlisted men and our military service in general."

The following extract from Gen. Howard's report gives no uncertain sound:

"The post-exchange in the department presents the appearance of a small country store or refreshment room in all the premises, except in the room where beer is served. When one enters this he is immediately met with disagreeable odors. The impression is irresistible that here beer is easily and cheaply procured, so that it is constantly forced upon the attention of the enlisted man. He is, indeed, always tempted to indulge in its use. Commanding officers have generally agreed with me that it would be well to abolish the sale of this beer entirely and to substitute for it other beverages. There seems, as I have before reported, a great objection to having a soldier in the uniform of the United States behind the counter dealing out beer like a barkeeper in a common resort.

"The commanding officers, without exception, object to this. If there must be a barkeeper in the service he should be hired for that purpose. Just now, under the present system, soldiers appear to be more generally led to drink, and the offences that go with drinking, than under the old sutler and post trader systems. I am strongly convinced by the actual experiment that, while a few drunkards are moderated in their affliction by strong beer, the remaining soldiers who fall under temptation are worse off, and that military offences are rather increased in number and aggravation."

General Howard also asserts that the commanding officers in the Department of the Atlantic "have generally agreed with me that it would be well to abolish the sale of beer entirely."

In your issue of December 22, the article from an army post exposes further drinking customs in the military posts. The existence of officers' social clubs, where the use of wine is encouraged, reveals the true reason for establishment of the post-exchange, or canteen among the enlisted men. It would be an inconsistency to make no provision for them in the use of their favorite beverage—beer—while their superiors indulge themselves in champagne!

New York City.

"WHEREVER a flower grows a seed has been planted, either by the hand of man or nature."

"REPROACHING ourselves or others for past mistakes is a useless cruelty. Lessons for wise well-doing in the future is the 'more excellent way.'"

"WE would not be so troubled about the limitations of our time and strength, if we realized how wonderfully the Lord can use us in the performance of our daily duties. Simple faithfulness to those whom we are called to serve, is a constant and acceptable doing of our Master's will, for hath not He placed us where we are, and given us our work?"

MISS ACKERMANN IN BURMAH.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In good time I took passage on a B. & I. steamer for Burmah. It was a large boat, and, being the only lady passenger, I had a spacious, convenient cabin to myself. At this time of the year the water is as smooth as glass, so we sailed on day after day, scarcely knowing the steamer moved. It was such a blessing to have the calm, for I suffer so much at sea. If I had been ill that trip, I really believe I should have taken the first steamer for home; but it was a very restful, happy time, though somewhat warm.

One week from Singapore found us anchored in the river at Rangoon, and Burmah is at last reached, after long expectation. A warm welcome awaited me from those faithful white-ribbon sisters, whose very names had become dear to me; it was a great pleasure to take them by the hand and hear of their success, as well as their difficulties.

On the night of my arrival I addressed the Temperance Society of the Church of England, and the next night the mission was opened. The Young Men's Institute was crowded, and the meeting was most enthusiastic. The American Baptists were holding their annual meetings, and they left that night free to join us; so, with all these ministers and missionaries, we had a stirring prayer-meeting at the close of the address.

The interest continued during the week, closing with a temperance rally at which the forces were gathered in good numbers—the Bands of Hope, Christian Endeavor Society, W. C. T. U. and I. O. G. T.; it was a pretty sight to see, in the last named society, the dark faces and bright eyes of the native lodge, with red, pink or white turbans twined about their heads with a twist known only to these people. I wish I could send you the photograph.

On Sunday I was invited to take the regular service in the M. E. church. It was filled with both people and the Spirit—a most blessed time; many tarried to the after-meeting; Christians came forward asking a blessing, others came as seekers; one young man, who had not been to church in nine years, completely broke down, and we felt that meeting at least would stand the test of eternity.

The next place visited was the old capital, Mandalay, a journey of a day and night by rail in not over comfortable carriages. A combination of circumstances including rains, prevented a large attendance, but we had one meeting with the soldiers that was such a time of blessing to us all, I felt quite repaid for the journey. This place is full of interest, the seat of ancient royalty and very unlike lower Burmah. I stopped with one of the Baptist missionaries and was deeply interested in her grand work.

Leaving Mandalay I traveled all day and night, reaching Rangoon just in time to catch the steamer to Maulmein, a day's journey by sea. The sight of a steamer made me feel ill and the very thought of boarding it filled my heart with dismay; but I embarked and settled down to a sort of martyrdom, when to my surprise and delight I found the water as smooth as a mill-pond, and I was able to spend the whole day in writing.

We reached the place at about six, and I was hurried off to the house for a meeting at seven. This was held in the Burmese Church, and I spoke to the natives through an interpreter. At the close, a large number signed the pledge. Meetings were held among the English, including drawing-room and children's gatherings, also among the native women.

At the close of the mission a day was spent in visiting the caves, fifteen miles distant. We started at six a. m. drove down to the river, were taken across in a long, native boat very like an Indian canoe, continuing our journey of a few miles in bullock carts. Clean straw was put in the cart, bagging over it, and on this, tailor fashion, we took our seats. The cart was innocent of springs or seats, as every stone or stick in the road reminded us. An awning of a flannel blanket and a piece of calico, protected us from the scorching rays of the sun. The caves were reached by ten o'clock a. m. After refreshments we started out to walk to the chief cave; at the entrance we were provided with torches, and our guide, having a good supply of blue lights, would climb to some high point and from a dark nook, set fire to a torch which perfectly revealed all the beauties of these wonderful caverns. The formation is in great chambers, dark recesses, heavy pillars, tinted by the flow of mineral water, and the usual dampness to wade through. Bats in great numbers have found refuge in the darkness; disturbed by the light, they flew from side to side beating themselves against the walls, and making that wild, weird sound which belongs only to the bat. On the whole, it was very like wandering among the tombs, especially in the cave where we saw images of every size of Gautama. In one large cavern we found the ruins of many, many idols.

Some of these Burmese, to make merit and help work out their own salvation, have beautified this cave and made of it a place of worship. In the dome-shaped caverns hundreds of small images have been carved so the whole ceiling is covered with idols; in every nook and corner, in all attitudes, have been placed their gods, all the image of Buddha; the large ones have been built in a reclining position, of bricks filled in and rounded out with mortar, others have been chiseled out of alabaster or carved out of wood, some sitting, others standing. The faces are simply hideous; the lobe of the ear is so long it rests on the shoulder, the arms and hands are so out of proportion as to cause a shudder, the toes and fingers are all of the same length, for Buddha was the only perfect man, his toes and fingers being the same length.

Comparatively few visit the caves and little has been said of them by travelers, but they are well worth inspection.

I stopped at Rangoon on my way to Calcutta and held the last meetings in Burmah. The work rolls on, much interest is being taken in the World's Fair, and I am in hope our work in these lands will be well represented.

THE WORK OF NATIONAL AMERICAN WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I hope your readers, especially those who are interested in the line of work followed by the franchise department of the National W. C. T. U. will find time to read something of the doings of the late annual convention at Washington, of the association which nationally represents the cause which is in one way so closely allied to the temperance work, and in another way so different from it.

For more than a year there has existed a Columbian Exposition committee having in charge the interests of woman's suffrage at the Exposition, at least the presentation of the subject which we conceive to be of such underlying importance to all lines of the work of women for the uplifting of humanity. This committee has been in correspondence with its state members with the idea of having them secure in the state buildings a place for the distribution of suffrage literature, etc.; their success has not been great in this department of the work, but it is the aim of the committee to more than make up for this, by a series of daily meetings during the entire time of the World's Fair, at which suffrage, and indeed, all lines of woman's work, shall be set forth at some place on the grounds, for the better part of an hour each day. It is not proposed to make these meetings formal; just an address and the opportunity for a hand-shake of those meeting there on the common ground of interest in the advancement of women along all lines.

Another part of the work of this committee is to arrange the program for the department meeting of the N. A. W. S. A. in the World's Congress of Representative Women, in the Art Palace during the third week of May, and if they are successful in carrying out the program already planned, this will be one of the most attractive of the grand series of meetings which will show the work of women in organization, while the general program of the Congress will be arranged along lines which will include the work of all women outside of, as well as in, organized associations. Among the thousands of women whom the World's Congress of Representative Women will attract to Chicago at that time, many who are even not committed to the full faith in the principle of equality for women in political life, will yet be eager to see and meet the pioneers in the movement which many women believe has been the greatest factor in bringing in the day when such grand gatherings of women are possible. To hear even a few words from women like Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Lucy Stone, Susan B. Anthony will be a benediction to the women who make their pilgrimage to the Congress of Representative Women as to a Mecca from which they are to carry back to the ordinary days and hours, an inspiration to nobler living and purer ideals for their sons and daughters.

Aside from the work at that center of influence, the Exposition, this year's efforts of the association will be directed chiefly to aid Kansas women in their preparations for the constitutional campaign, which, as soon as the gentlemen of the Kansas legislature decide who shall come uppermost, and can give the undivided attention of the "legal male mind" to other things, is likely to be provided for in the near future.

Kansas is already comparatively well organized, but in view of the immense influence which the women there already have politically, and feeling that should the opportunity for a constitutional amendment be given them, the world will regard it as a sign of the decadence of the equal suffrage sentiment there, should they not make a brave fight for full freedom, the National-American decided to hold up the hands of the Kansas women and urge them to an attempt to a careful and complete congressional district organization of the entire state. To this end it solicits contributions of money and literature, to be sent to Mrs. Laura M. Johns, the chairman of the Kansas Campaign Committee, at Salina, Kansas.

It was decided also to carry forward the work of the National Enrollment of Suffragists, under the charge of Mrs. Louisa Southworth, 844 Prospect street, Cleveland, Ohio, who, as chairman of this committee is, with the other chairmen of other standing committees, a member of the executive body of the organization.

This position in the executive committee was conferred upon the chairman of all Standing Committees mentioned in the by-laws; those who work for any association in this capacity, need to have the opportunity afforded by attendance upon the executive meetings, to understand all the business workings of the organization. It was this thought which induced the convention to so amend the by-laws as to add to the former executive committee all these chairmen, who with the members of their committees are elected by the general officers of the N. A. W. S. A.

The plan of work for this year includes a brief, suggestive constitution for local associations. It will be part of the duty of the corresponding secretary to push the work of organization all over the country, though in this, she will not in any way interfere with the work of the state societies. In many cases there are women in small towns thoroughly interested in the subject of equal political rights for their sex, and fully capable of carrying on a local organization, yet these very same women are so unaccustomed to any public action whatever, that they are timid about forming an organization in their town. With this suggestive constitution before them in the plan of work, the taking of the first step in this direction cannot seem to them so much like setting forth upon unknown sea without chart or compass.

Woman's Day at Chautauquas, state and county fairs has been such a pronounced success wherever it has been tried, that this opportunity is not only to be embraced wherever it offers, but is to be urged upon all suffrage organizations as one to be sought for diligently. The large audiences assembled on such occasions, are already somewhat imbued with the idea of woman's ability in many departments of work; it remains only to give to them a capable speaker, one who will set before them in plain, common-sense fashion the duty of women to bear a share in the political housekeeping of the nation, to win for our cause many enthusiastic adherents.

There was a lively discussion upon a resolution which came to the convention from the resolution committee, which deprecated strongly the recent action of Congress in conditioning its last gift to the World's Fair Commission, upon the closing of the gates upon Sunday. The resolution was directed, not specifically against this particular action of Congress, but generally against any action showing a tendency to make the central government an ally of religious feeling of any denomination whatever. This resolution was finally indefinitely postponed, but not until its discussion had proven the ability of "many women of many minds" to discuss fully and freely a subject which called forth the expression of all shades of opinion.

The other resolutions passed called forth but little discussion. Several of them were in part repetitions of sections of the plan of work. Of those which were more particularly in the province of resolutions the following are the most important:

WHEREAS, Morality is better taught by example than by precept, and the action of a government is a more powerful guide towards truth and honesty than any of its professions, and whereas, the United States government is at present based upon the profession that it is a government of the people, though half the people are actually excluded from government, therefore—

Resolved, That in the interests of public morality we denounce the United States government in its present position, as a practical teacher of dishonesty, and call upon all legislators to enfranchise women as the first step towards redeeming the sacred promises of the founders of our government to the people.

Resolved, That the National-American Woman's Suffrage Association is non-partisan, and appeals to the enlightened men of all parties to do justice to women citizens as a plain matter of fidelity to the principles upon which our National government is professedly founded.

Resolved, That without expressing any opinion on the proper qualifications for voting, we call attention to the significant facts that in every state there are more women who can read and write than all the illiterate male voters; more white women who can read and write than all negro voters; more American women who can read and write than all foreign voters—so that the enfranchisement of such women would settle the vexed question of rule by illiteracy, whether of home-grown or foreign-born production.

WHEREAS, A Constitutional Convention is to be called in the state of New York in 1894, and whereas, two governors in succession, Governor Hill and Governor Flower, have recommended in their annual messages that the woman suffrage organizations should be represented by two women as delegates,

Resolved, That we express the thanks of this convention to Governor Hill and Governor Flower for that recognition of justice due women.

Resolved, That as all experience proves that the rights of the laboring man are best preserved in governments where he has possession of the ballot, we therefore demand on behalf of the laboring woman the same powerful instrument that she may herself protect her own interests, and that we urge all organized bodies of working women, whether they be workers in the field of philanthropy, education, trade, manufacture or general industry, to join our association in the endeavor to make woman legally and politically a free agent as the best means for furthering any and every line of woman's work.

Resolved, That as the education of women is the entering wedge to equal pay for equal work in all professions, the thanks of this convention are tendered Miss May Garrett, of Baltimore, for her noble furthering of our principles in making it possible for women to enter the Johns Hopkins Medical College upon equal terms with men, and that we also call the attention of women of wealth to the great need of making provision for the entrance of their sex into all other institutions which possess superior facilities for mental training.

OUT FROM DARKNESS.

BY MRS. F. M. HOWARD.

It was in a tall tenement house, that a woman lay upon a miserable bed in the corner of a room, dark, cold and damp. A young babe was lying beside her and the guerdon of motherhood so recently acquired accounted for the pallid face.

A table and two or three chairs were grouped about the bed. No comforts, no tiniest scrap of color or brightness lightened the dismalness of the place. Curtains would have been a superfluity for every ray of light was precious. The window-panes were dingy, cracked and adorned with many cobwebs, for this poor creature upon the bed had long been too feeble, too heart-sick to keep up her routine of domestic duties.

It was nearing noon now, and the poor room was as nearly cheerful as it ever became, the noon-day sun peering in at one corner of the dingy window, throwing a ray of light across the corner of the table, but bringing out the litter of crumbs upon it, the soiled plates and cups, cracked and discolored with long use.

A man had eaten breakfast there long hours before, and after doing what he could for his sick wife and the babe, had gone to his day's work. Tom McGlenn was not a bad man at heart; when he could let the drink alone he was even thoughtful and kind, but with liquor in, reason, kindness and all better qualities went out, and he was cross and brutal.

Still she clung to him and suffered this bitter poverty with him. Every day his going out was a menace, and his coming in a dread. Every day that he came home sober but brought her nearer to that "next time," when he should be in a drunken debauch. To-day she listened apprehensive at every footfall upon the rickety stairs, unsteady or firm her trained ear could detect so quickly.

Handsome Tom McGlenn had been "only a little wild," when he first met her, a happy, rosy girl in a country home; he thought it no harm to take "a social glass occasionally," and so Mary had married him, against the wishes and advice of her friends.

They had come to the city where Tom had a good position. Losing it through his growing love of drink, they had drifted,—drifted—and always down, until they landed in this miserable tenement where Mary lay with her young babe waiting for, yet dreading Tom's return.

She had one spot of cheerfulness in her dreary life. The room opposite hers in the next tenement was occupied by a poor, but happy and respectable family. They were neat and painstaking, and the little room was clean as hands could make it. A bit of cheese-cloth draped the upper sash of the window, and a growing plant stood there, ready to catch every ray of light, imparting far more than it received, as poor Mary McGlenn watched each leaf and flower with interest and delight.

Perhaps some idea of the cheer which a glimpse of their sunnier home life could carry into that gloomy room had entered into the little widow's heart, for she seldom shaded her window at night, and Mary could see her as she drew out her table for the evening meal; then later as she undressed her children, drawing them about her knee for their evening prayer—carrying her back to the time when she, too, said prayers at a gentle mother's knee in happy innocence of the bitter experiences in store for her. They had lost sight of her at home, in her frequent changes, and of late Mary had had no heart to remind them of her miserable existence.

"If you could only help me to sit up a bit, Tom. I get so tired lying here." Tom had come home in an unusually pleasant temper.

"All right, my girl; and how is the kid?"

"He's slept all the morning." She turned her thin face toward the child with a shade of that loving tenderness which happier mothers show their babes.

She could not rejoice in bringing a life into the world when she had nothing but misery and want to offer it.

"Thank you, Tom." Wrapping her in a faded shawl, he had seated her in the one battered rocker in the room, drawn close to the window, where she could see the plant, now covered with bloom.

His thoughtfulness touched her, and, drawing his head down, to his surprise, she kissed him. There was a passionate longing in her heart for something warmer and better than the cheerless life she led.

"Eh, Mary, what is it?" he said, with an awkward attempt at tenderness, stroking the hair off her forehead with his rough hand until she looked more wan and wild than before. It had been so long since there had been anything like sentiment between them that he shrank from it. A cry from the bed created a welcome diversion.

"There's the little chap," he said, turning quickly.

"Tom, do you suppose the woman over there would come in to see me?" she asked with hesitation, as he brought her the child.

"What's your notion o' that Mary? Mrs. Mulrooney'll be in soon."

"But she's so coarse, Tom. That one over there is more like what I was used to. I'm sure she would do me good."

"Do you want me to go up an' ask 'er?"

"If you only would, Tom."

Half an hour later he stood at the neighbor's door and told his errand. Dolly Barrows was a small, brown-eyed woman, one of that kind who enters into another's life with cheery impulsiveness and makes their need her opportunity.

"Why, yes, of course I'll come. I can bring my sewing and sit awhile as well as not." She made buttonholes on a class of work demanding the best skill, and, with the aid of her widow's pension, managed to make a living by it. With kindly forethought she arranged a plate of food from her own scanty store, and with it, covered over with the remains of a fine linen napkin in one hand, and her sewing in the other, she soon made her appearance in Mary's room.

"Seems like I knew you," said the sick woman gratefully, as the little widow sat opposite and talked, cheerfully, hopefully bringing out the bright side of every thought, and listening with patient interest to the story of sadness which poor Mary, in her longing for sympathy, poured out.

"I've watched you so much through the window. If you only knew how much good it's done me—just the lookin' on."

"Well, I'm right glad if 't has," Dolly replied heartily. "I'll always leave the curtains up now."

"I s'pose you've had your troubles too?" Mary's eyes rested on the faded, black dress.

"Yes, I've had troubles; but I've had a partner in 'em, or I don't know how I could a bore 'em."

"A partner?" Mary's voice had an inquiring inflection.

"Yes, the Lord Jesus Christ. If He hadn't taken hold of the heavy end I don't know how I could have borne what I have."

"I used to hear tell o' Him when I was a girl," Mary replied wearily; "But I've mostly lost all track o' Him late years. Why, ma'am I hain't been inside a church or heerd a sermon in fifteen years."

"Poor soul!" cried Dolly. "How can you bear it?"

"Churches an' r'ligion haint for such as me. I'm too low down fer that."

"Oh, no, no, exclaimed Dolly eagerly. "You're just the one as needs 'em most. Don't you now know the blessed Christ didn't go to the rich to make friends, but to the poor, the outcast and the sick? It's them that needs Him the most that He meets half way."

The little widow brought more of brightness into the miserable home than it had known for many a day. She tidied the room, making the most of the poor material she found to do with, and when she left, Mary was snugly tucked up in the newly-made bed with the baby on her arm, and more of hope and courage in her poor heart than she had known for many a day.

Tom kept sober for a remarkably long time—so long in fact that even Mary dared to hope for better things, and to look for his home-coming with unusual cheerfulness; and more of comfort too crept into the dark room as Tom's earnings came in with regularity.

Dolly Barrow's first visit was not her last, and a tin can, in which was a growing slip off the plant Mary had admired so much, was upon her dingy window sill. The baby laughed now, bless him. He had not learned what a sad, unmirthful world he had come into, and added his little mite of good-fellowship and cheer, and upon the whole, Mary's lot was brighter.

Dolly Barrow's words on that first visit had taken a haunting hold of her heart. "You're the very one who needs it most," and a growing sense of a pressing need of something beyond the merely physical, kept hold of her with a clinging pertinacity.

It was a dark and rainy night, and the great audience-room where Mr. Moody was holding his wonderful meetings, filled slowly, men coming in damp and with muddy feet, women enshrouded in waterproofs, drawn there by a charm which they could not resist.

Upon one of the front seats during the ingathering of thousands, sat a woman with a puny babe in her arms. She had no waterproof garment to protect her from the wet, no tight shoes to keep her poor feet dry in the slippery streets, only an old dingy shawl drawn closely across her breast, on which slept the babe; a faded, battered thing upon her head which had once been called a bonnet.

When Mr. Moody rose to begin the service, her eyes were fixed upon his face with a hungry, beseeching look which was a revelation in itself. Come ye who are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest. It was a wonderful message, fitting into her sore need as if it had been spoken for herself alone; and she drank it in eagerly, joyfully, the tears streaming down her faded cheeks like rain. How weary she was—how heavy-laden, for Tom had been upon another spree of late, and the dark home was darker still for its recent light.

My yoke is easy, and my burden is light. The baby upon her breast began to nestle and to cry, and the poor mother tried to hush it. She had given it all the food she could, and it was still unsatisfied and half-starved, poor little creature. Heads began to turn, and unsympathetic eyes looked fretfully at the little disturber of the meeting, and with a heavy heart Mary arose. How could she leave this rich feast of hope and peace spread out before her, yet she must not stay to annoy others, and with disappointed grief in her large, sad eyes, she looked up in Mr. Moody's kind face as she turned to go.

He read it all—her pitiful longing, her great need, and called out cheerily, "Sit down, good mother. Let the baby cry if it wants to. I can talk louder than it can cry. And now, good friends, do not look at the mother but just pray that the Lord will bless her. Probably she has no one to take care of the baby for her, and she may not have been in church before for years."

Mary sat down again with a grateful look upon her pinched face, and the child soon dropped off to sleep, while she drank in the remainder of the sermon, her tired soul reveling in the luxury of this water of life.

It was done, and Mr. Moody was asking any who had a desire for salvation to arise. Salvation; ah, yes, how she wanted it—how she needed the rock, Christ Jesus, to flee to in her weary life; and the first one in all that great assembly, she arose with her baby in her arms, and presented herself for prayer.

Many others arose also, and Mr. Moody then asked those who wished to become Christians to go into the inquiry room. The baby had awakened as Mr. Sankey began singing, and she hesitated in distress. A tall young man stepped up to her saying respectfully, "Let me take the baby while you go in."

She did not look into his kind face in the intensity of her great desire, but placing the child in his arms, she hastened away in glad relief. He was a stalwart young fellow, a new recruit in the Lord's army, burning to do something for the Master. Could he have chosen a more unselfish service than walking up and down those aisles before the assembled thousands, with a crying baby in his arms?

It was his first experience in nursing; Christ washed the disciples' feet once only during His ministry, but the service was glorified by its motive, and when the pale mother came out, her face transfigured with the joy of a redeemed soul, he was more than repaid.

He looked at her with a warm smile of sympathy, he had scarcely glanced at her face before, and how he started in surprise, "Mary McGlenn, is it you?"

Perhaps he might not have recognized her with that old, grey look of trouble upon her face, but this new experience of love and peace had brought back a semblance of her lost youth and beauty.

She looked up into his face with wildly joyful eyes. "It is Nelson, my own dear brother," she said aloud, nearly dropping the child in her eagerness to embrace him.

"Oh, Nell, I am so happy," she whispered as they stood in the vestibule, "I have found my Lord, I have found you, and now I am sure He will help us to rescue poor Tom." And bearing the baby, which, rocked in the brother's arms was sweetly asleep, they passed out rejoicing into the rainy night.

ACT as if God were, and you shall know Him. This is the base line of the pyramid of the strongest and most helpful character.—F. E. W.

"THE night has a thousand eyes,
The day has one,
Yet the light of the whole world dies
When dies the sun;
The mind has a thousand eyes,
The heart has one,
Yet the light of the whole life flies
When love has flown."

A LITTLE WORD LOST.

I lost a very little word
  Only the other day;
A very naughty little word
  I had not meant to say.
If only it were really lost,
  I should not mind a bit;
I think I should deserve a prize
  For really losing it.

For if no one could ever find
  Again that little word,
So that no more from any lips
  Could it be ever heard,
I'm sure we all of us would say
  That it was something fine
With such completeness to have lost
  That naughty word of mine.

But then it wasn't really lost
  When from my lips it flew;
My little brother picked it up,
  And now he says it, too.
Mamma said that the worst would be
  I could not get it back;
But the worst of it now seems to me,
  I'm always on its track.

Mamma is sad; papa looks grieved;
  Johnnie has said it twice;
Of course it is no use for me
  To tell him it's not nice.
When you lose other things, they're lost;
  But lose a naughty word,
And for once 'twas heard before,
  Now twenty times 'tis heard.

If it were only really lost!
  Oh, then I should be glad
I let it fall so carelessly
  That day that I got mad.
Lose other things, you never seem
  To come upon their track.
But lose a naughty little word,
  It's always coming back.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

VII.

PLANES.

Another member for our band, do you say, Jimmy? So much the better. Glad to see you, Edith. Let me call the roll, so I may be sure I know you all. Jimmy and his sister Jennie, two; Tom, Dick and Harry,—or do you say Thomas, Richard and Henry?—from the big farm, five; Florence and Helen from the hill, seven; and Edith just come, eight. Four boys and four girls. Tom is seventeen and Florence—eh?—fifteen. The rest of you are younger, down to Jennie who is only ten—but she handles a hammer as well as the best of you.

Yes. I enjoy telling you how to make shelves and boxes and screen doors and wheels, but there are certain things which you must learn before you can do any work properly. You must know now to use a tool, and also how to prepare it for use before you can expect satisfactory results. First and most common, we have sawing and planing. Guess we'll leave saw filing for the present, as it is one of the most particular things a carpenter has to do, in the way of sharpening tools. But we will try planes. Notice, first, that a plane consists of block, handle, iron, cap and wedge. Also that the block has a face, heel, toe and throat. Guess you can identify the various parts. Yes, Helen, the iron is the part that cuts. The cap is practically a thickening of the iron, its use being to turn the shaving upward and prevent splintering. It is to be set about one-sixteenth from the cutting edge of the iron, closest for finest work. In sharpening the iron set the end on the grindstone-frame, with the sharp edge on the stone. I like it best to have the stone turn toward me because, when it turns the other way, it makes a feather edge which prevents seeing how much the iron is ground away. Have a trough for water, but have some rags touch the stone enough to prevent a drenching. Yes, let the trough down so the stone can be dry when not in use. So have I seen water dripping upon the stone; but it gives no chance for the rags, and is in the way when two want to grind at once. Take too long to explain my grindstone now; wait till we get through with planes.

Yes, you are all asking at once how far from the stone to set the end of the iron. That depends on the length of the iron and the size of the stone. You must decide it by the kind of edge you want. Grind all on one side, of course, like a chisel. Make a wedge that will fill an angle of about twenty degrees. Divide a quarter-circle into four equal parts, and you have a pattern. For clean pine, say fifteen, and for rough, knotty work, thirty. And furthermore, children, if you hold the iron in the same position all the time the ground part will be concave, which is all right for clean work, but if you are grinding for knots, you want it convex, and can make it so to any desired degree by moving the end of the iron. Now comes the most particular part of plane-sharpening, namely, curving the edge. I mean, reckoned from side to side. That is, the middle of the cutting edge must be longer than the corners. Yes, every stroke will cut a trough, but it must be so, or you will have marks of the corners all over your work. And the corners must be exactly the same length. Yes, Jennie, the try-square. Place the edge of the iron against the inside of the handle and push up so that the sharp edge would hit the inner edge of the steel square, then look through to the light. When the middle touches, the corners should be scant about one-thirty-second of an inch—for ordinary work, such as ours, less for fine work. In grinding, roll the iron gently from side to side until you get a uniform curve. Finish on the hone, and try the edge by cutting very small shavings from soft pine. This a good way to try any tool you are sharpening. When it cuts like cheese you may call it ready.

To set it, take the block in your left hand, fingers on face, thumb in throat, toe toward your eye. Push iron in so you can just see it, holding it with left thumb; then the wedge, and drive it rather tight; then glance along the face and drive the iron into sight. Try it on your work until you get it right, then remember it for next time. Now you will see the necessity of having the corners the same length. If the iron does not fit too tight in the block you can drive the iron slightly to either side. If set too deep, a sharp stroke on the heel will raise it. To get iron out, strike heel, then tap wedge or top of toe, holding iron in left hand all the time.

Look at that clock! You've only time to get to school, and I haven't told you about the self-setting planes, nor how to plane, at all, nor even mentioned the boot-jack. Come earlier next time.

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

A mouse fell into a beer vat, poor thing, and a cat passing by saw the struggling little creature.

The mouse said to the cat:

"Help me out of my difficulty."

"If I do, I shall eat you," said the cat.

"Very well," replied the mouse; "I would rather be eaten by a decent cat than drowned in such a horrible mess of stuff as this."

It was a sensible cat, and said: "I certainly shall eat you, and you must promise me on your word of honor that I may do so."

"Very well, I will give you the promise."

So the cat fished the mouse out, and, trusting to the promise, she dropped it for an instant.

The mouse darted away and crept into a hole in the corner, where the cat could not get him.

"But didn't you promise me I might eat you?" said puss.

"Yes, I did," replied the mouse; "but didn't you know that when I made that promise I was in liquor?"

And how many promises made in liquor have been broken!—Selected.

"I'VE GOT ORDERS NOT TO GO."

"I've got orders, positive orders, not to go there—orders that I dare not disobey," said a youth who was being tempted to enter a smoking and gambling saloon.

"Come, don't be so womanish; come along like a man," shouted the youths.

"No, I can't break orders," said John.

"What special orders have you got? Come show 'em to us if you can; show us your orders."

John took out a neat wallet from his pocket and pulled out a neatly folded paper. "It is here," he said, unfolding the paper, and showing it to the boys. They looked and one of them read aloud: "Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not into the way of wicked men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away."

"Now," said John, "you see my orders forbid me going with you; they are God's orders, and by His help I don't mean to break them."—Religious Telescope.

A BRIGHT little girl who saw three sisters with hair of a rich auburn, remarked to her mother, "Seems to me, mamma, that kind of hair must be redheaditary in that family."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—A sweet little temperance girl, in Missouri, named Beulah May Jones, seven years old, recites the following pretty poem:

MY TEMPERANCE DOLL.

Miss Frances Willard is her name
  A half a pound she weighs;
She's one foot tall and one year old
  And five months and two days.

My other dolly used to wear
  The ribbons that come round
Papa's cigars, but none of these,
  On Frances shall be found.

But the white ribbon does she wear
  On every sack and dress
I've temperance meetings for her, too,
  Who lectures them? You guess.

Tea parties, too, she often has
  With my new china set;
Her grandma, that's my mamma,
  Makes such cute things for my pet.

Puddings, without wine flavoring
  And mince pies without cider,
No candy bottles filled with wine,
  But water pure beside her.

These things are so much nicer,
  Than those on my mamma's shelf,
And I am such a temperance girl
  I eat them all myself!

And here is a part of the nice letter written for her by her mamma:

We have five boys and three girls in our family and mamma wants us all to vote for temperance when we are twenty-one. My baby brother is so sweet, I wish you could see him, his name is Herbert Stanley, Powderly Leland, Little Boy Blue, Little Jack Horner, Coon. His other names are Little Explorer and Young Crusader. We are going to have an L. T. L. meeting at our church, Saturday to write our pledges to send to Miss Gordon.

Quite a variety of names for one baby boy aren't they, children? I wish there were thousands of big temperance families like this one, growing up to vote for Home Protection.

I would like to hear from many other little girls who will also learn and recite Beulah's nice little piece.

Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

THE PROHIBITION VOTE.

After a long delay we are able to furnish the prohibition vote cast at the general election, November 8, 1892. We are indebted to Mr. George E. Plumbe, the editor of the Daily News Almanac, for the information. He corresponded with the secretaries of the various states, and his figures may be considered reliable. It is believed that in all parts of the country, and especially in the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, North Carolina, Texas and Virginia, prohibition votes were thrown out as "scattering." Probably an exact accounting would give twenty thousand additional votes, but this can never be. Both Democratic and Republican inspectors of election do not feel called upon to cultivate a very tender conscience respecting the treatment of prohibition votes. Such obstacles have always existed; we must look for them still.

The vote of 1892 is returned at 270,710. One of the first things the average reader will notice is the gain over the vote for Mr. Fisk in 1888. That vote was 249,945, and the gain as compared with four years ago is 20,765. These figures are eloquent, if by eloquence we mean that which moves people. We imagine the most wide-spread feeling among Prohibitionists is one of mingled surprise and indignation. "If it had been an enemy," said David, "then I could have borne it. But mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, even he lifted up his heel against me."

If this country were not swarming with Prohibitionists, if in the present generation, great majorities in some states, and in others little short of majorities, had not declared for prohibition, the case would be different. Where were the 323,000 Prohibitionists of Ohio who voted for the amendment in 1883, and the 46,000 who formed the majority in Maine on the vote for Constitutional Amendment? Where are the millions of church members, who with common consent, refuse to admit a liquor dealer into the church, and then refuse to perform the one special act which counts, namely, to vote for prohibition. It is this which tries the patience of Prohibitionists who voice their principles in the way appropriate for citizens. If a man says he does not believe in prohibition we can understand him. He and his kind are consistent. But when one professes to believe in prohibition, and then refuses to express that belief in the legitimate way, there is quite a different case.

IRELAND'S MAGNA CHARTA.

England's invincible premier justifies the proverb of man's immortality until his work is done, as in the glory but not in the usual decrepitude of eighty-three years he urges Home Rule as the most pressing issue before the new Parliament.

The scene of presentation of this second Home Rule bill challenges the brush of a painter. It is Mr. Gladstone's habit to leave before seven o'clock, but on that memorable night he did not go. It was nearly one o'clock in the morning, according to the New York Times' correspondent, when the motion to bring in the bill was reached. It was passed with a roar of vociferous "yeas." Mr. Gladstone moved toward the door as if he were about to leave the House, when he was arrested by the Speaker's call: "The first lord of the treasury." Turning, "with shoulders squared and head high in the air, he marched in solemn dignity up the whole length of the floor, and with an impressive gesture," handed the speaker the engrossed sheet representing his bill, while the entire body of his colleagues, British and Irish alike, sprang to their feet with a shout.

The second bill is not a copy of the first, fought over seven years ago. It is perhaps not as near what its author and sponsor would have it, but it is the best he can hope will now receive indorsement; and it will serve as a working theory in the great problem which its opponents pronounce insolvable. Compromises are the stepping-stones by which nations rise to better things.

Some years ago Mr. Gladstone declared that the man who would study the highest types of statesmanship must go to school to the United States, and there can be no doubt that his bill is modeled after American state and federal relations as closely as British conditions and monarchical prejudices make it advisable to do so. To us, accustomed to the noiseless operation of our own light-running machinery of state and national rule, it seems very clumsy, but we have the answer of its designer to other critics, "It is impossible to redress the wrongs of seven centuries in one session of Parliament."

One of the first and most positive provisions of the second Home Rule bill assures religious freedom, forbidding the Irish legislature to make any law respecting the establishment or endowment of any religion on the one side, or of prohibiting the free exercise of it on the other. No laws can be passed conferring privilege on account of religious belief, or prejudicially affecting the right to establish or maintain denominational institutions of education or charity. The child will have a right to attend every school receiving public money, while being present at religious instruction is not obligatory if his parents are of dissenting faith. It is specified that every subject of the Queen shall be eligible to the office of Lord Lieutenant, without reference to religious belief. The purpose seems to cover in detail all that our Constitution guarantees in according every man the liberty to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience.

The legislature is to consist of two bodies, a council of forty-eight members, having a term of eight years, twenty-four being elected every four years by popular vote, and a legislative assembly holding not longer than five years. Every man owning or occupying land, or a tenement of the relative value of twenty pounds, may vote for councilors. This very reasonable property qualification is a defense against the mendicant population. The date of the first election is to be fixed by the Queen, who will direct the arrangements necessary for setting in motion the new government, and in whom the executive power of Ireland will continue to be vested.

Appeal from the courts of Ireland to the House of Lords will cease with the passage of this act, and instead will be taken to the Queen in council. Is there significance in this wording of the clause protecting the royal prerogatives? "The hereditary revenues of the crown in Ireland, which are managed by the commissioners of Her Majesty's woods, forests, and land revenues, shall continue during the life of Her Majesty." All public revenues are to be paid into the Irish exchequer, which is separate from the United Kingdom. The postal and telegraph service is to be turned over to the home government, also the post-office savings banks.

In relation to lands and police regulation the act provides for gradual accession to power. The earliest date at which the legislature can be convened is September, 1894, and for the first three years it will have no authority over the relation of landlord and tenant, and can enact no laws affecting the purchase, sale, or letting of land, save for the purchase of land for railways, harbors waterworks or other local improvements. After the passage of the act there will be no new appointments to the forces either of the Royal Irish Constabulary or of the Dublin metropolitan police and those now constituting them will be gradually supplanted by police forces established under Irish legislation. The change must be completed by the end of six years.

Ireland will retain seats in the British Parliament, but will not vote upon matters exclusively affecting Great Britain, nor upon any tax not levied on her own people. The Viceroy, or Lord Lieutenant, is appointed by the Crown, to a position somewhat analagous to a territorial governor in the United States—save in the matter of salary, which is five thousand pounds a year, to be paid from the Irish exchequer. This act undoubtedly assures better things than they have known before, but the cry of "Justice to Ireland" will hardly down on this side the Atlantic while her imperially created governor draws from her starving people, the majority of whom "taste meat but once a year," a salary equal to one-half the salary of the Chief Executive of this great empire, with its food-surfeited population.

The bill comes to second reading, March 13. There is rumor of a flank movement led by Joseph Chamberlain, in the form of a bill proposing local parliaments and home rule for all the provinces of the empire. That if enacted it will be the beginning of which imperial federation will be the end seems not improbable. Such outcome would be the culmination of England's glory. Then would she be indeed the Mother Country—mother of stalwart sons rather than of cringing dependents.

PHILLIPS BROOKS AS A PREACHER.

"God strikes a silence thro' you all
And giveth His beloved sleep."

Silence is the fittest encomium of kingly souls. The momentary hush which interrupts our lives when the great die, is more eloquent in their praise than any speech. Who that has felt the influence of a nature like that of Phillips Brooks would express, even if he could, what it had been to him? But such power cannot be translated into words. We shall have to wait for some subtler medium to give it expression.

To many, Phillips Brooks was a friend and pastor,—the spiritual inspiration of their lives. Before the English-speaking world he was a preacher without a peer.

The analysis of genius is always the most difficult of tasks;—first, because one is often too much mastered by it to be capable of impartial judgment, and again, because genius, like beauty, is "its own excuse for being." There were certain striking features peculiar to the utterance of this great man which impressed many who heard him and left with them abiding memories.

The personality of the speaker and his standpoint were the rich, inexhaustible sources of his marvelous eloquence. All thoughtful persons readily distinguished moral teachers into two general groups, the inductive and the deductive. Phillips Brooks was a most illustrious example of the latter. Inductive teachers lead from life and experience up to the Final Cause, the Center of the Universe and the Sublimest Truth of the Bible, the Fatherhood of God. Phillips Brooks, on the contrary, starting with God, found everything to radiate from Him. To him, "the idea of Christ was the illumination and inspiration of existence," comprehension and expression of Him, the ruling passion of life. "I know in whom I have believed" was the keynote of those wonderful sermons. The wide reception and deep impression of these sermons were proof of the truth they so often expressed, that man hungers for and is made for the highest truth.

Current events, ephemeral phases of personality or society had no place in his discourses. It was the eternal and unchangeable truth that he gave men—God, the human soul, immortality. This was his standpoint.

How did the personality of Phillips Brooks fit him for deductive preaching? For inductive preaching, the power of analysis, general culture, keen observation, and quick wit are indispensable, or at least valuable qualifications. For deductive preaching, higher faculties are called into use, intuition, reflection, a high development of the moral sense, along with fine artistic perceptions, the best in man, the most intrinsic in woman. To all these Phillips Brooks added a trinity of force, physical, intellectual, moral, from which it is impossible to escape.

With such a physical personality as his, authority is inseparable, and its greatest charm, an authority not alone didactic, but also winning. But perhaps the dominant quality of his preaching was its simplicity, the simplicity which characterizes genius. The greatest truths, the sublimest conceptions, coming from him, seemed as natural and familiar as commonplaces from others. Those rich, sententious expressions came from his lips

"As effortless as woodland nooks
Send violets up and paint them blue."

Thought, clear, lofty and impassioned, created and molded that inimitable form whose force and harmony were but the exponents of the personality behind it. He was, in the highest sense, "to the manner born." All that was noble and beautiful was familiar to him, a part of himself. He was highly endowed with the artistic faculty, hence that nicety of discrimination in the choice of words and that use of illustration which made it a window through which new visions should dawn upon the soul. Of illustration he was sparing, as the true creator always is. Truth was his aim, not oratorical pyrotechnics. Not once did his taste fail him, because it was an instinct, not an acquisition. There was a rhythm and a balance to his periods, which lifted his hearers as by strong wings up to he finer air, where his soul was breathing.

The highest praise that can be given him is that craved by every artist, poet, musician, or preacher—he made his hearers forget himself in remembrance of his theme. When men went out from one of those sermons through which shone the grandest thought, the deepest love, their thought was, "How glorious is Truth! How wonderful is God!"—"How solemn is life!"

Greater than the greatest of his utterances, more human in his passionate sympathy with all humanity, more akin to the Divine in his life, "hid with Christ in God" in his most inspired moments, the man himself was so symmetrical, so ideal in character that he was to those who knew him a pattern scarcely equalled, never excelled. To such a soul the nature of God is only partial mystery.

"TEMPLE AND FUNDS."

Under the above heading appeared a long and sensational article in the Chicago Tribune of February 25, which fiercely attacks the management of the Temperance Temple. It purports to be an interview with Mr. J. B. Hobbs, husband of a prominent Chicago white-ribboner, who has formerly been considered a friend of the W. C. T. U. It is well known to our readers that Mrs. Hobbs has frequently objected to the Temple and its management, and all honest people will admire her for the courage she has exhibited in expressing her opinion in our great National Conventions. But just why Mr. Hobbs, who is not a stockholder in the Temple, is so greatly interested, and above all, why he makes use of the public press to offer his criticisms to the W. C. T. U., and make "suggestions" to Mrs. Carse, is utterly unaccountable. And be it here recorded that Mr. Hobbs has sought none of the Temple trustees to inquire into the correctness of the data which he is represented as furnishing and which they alone could supply.

It seems evident that Mr. Hobbs has been used as a convenient medium, and that the voluminous amount of information of which the shrewd reporter makes him possessed has been laboriously collected from many sources. Indeed it can be proved that the preparation of this article has occupied weeks, aye, months, of time. It is a source of the deepest regret that personal differences should so mar our glorious work, which the enemy stands ever ready to assail, and every assault on which causes him to rejoice. We are charitable enough to Mr. Hobbs to believe that he did not calculate that the burden of his influence, however great or small, would thus be thrown with the opposers of all good works.

We are happy to say the article has not, so far at least, detracted from the high estimate of Mrs. Carse held by prominent business men in Chicago, and in proof of which we attach the opinions of Mr. Marshall Field and Mr. William Deering, Chicago's millionaire merchant and manufacturer. Said Mr. Field:

"My knowledge of the affairs of the Woman's Temple are not of a character to admit of my discussing this affair. I am quite sure, however, that Mrs. Carse is a woman of high ideas and of excellent business qualifications. I am sure, also, that her policy will be found to have been justifiable."

Mr. Deering testifies:

"I have great admiration for Mrs. Carse's faith in her enterprise and ability to succeed, and am altogether in sympathy with the temperance association of which she is so prominent a member, and I would not like to be considered as criticising either its purposes or method."

Again and again has Mrs. Carse been assailed by a few opponents as to her disinterestedness in the erection of the Temple, and again and again has the National W. C. T. U. indorsed its great-hearted projector, and placed the the Temple as one of its affiliated interests. At the Convention in Denver last fall, the Temple received a full and searching discussion, and the result was that Mrs. Carse was triumphantly sustained in her management and the project was supported by this ringing resolution:

WHEREAS, The financial standing of the Temple has never before been so secure, and the outlook so hopeful as now—the report given and accepted here showing that by united effort we can, within one year, hold a controlling amount of Temple stock, therefore, resolved,

(a) That we will not cast doubt upon this enterprise; that we will not create distrust; that if any cannot help, they shall at least allow those who will do so, peace of mind in the doing; further, resolved,

(b) That in the sense of this Convention that for the sake of the W. C. T. U. and the great work to which it is pledged, and for the sake of the cause of woman's advancement in the world, there is but one just and reasonable course to pursue—that we stand with solid front and united effort until we reach a successful and triumphant completion of this great enterprise; and to this end we urge special and persistent effort for the Temple during this, our Columbian year.

The article in question asserts that THE UNION SIGNAL has "never published but one side of Temple affairs," in face of the fact that THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL, published at Denver last fall, gave a verbatim account of the Temple discussion, printing the statements of the opposition in full. THE UNION SIGNAL would, indeed, be slow to publish a malicious or undermining attack upon any indorsed W. C. T. U. project or affiliated interest, because loyalty to all these interests, of which the Temple is one, is the only consistent policy for our official organ.

It is known that this article, in substance, has been twice refused by the Tribune, and not until some well-known person, such as Mr. Hobbs, would stand back of it, was it accepted. While not attempting to answer any of the charges made against Mrs. Carse in her absence, all of which can and will be satisfactorily repudiated by her in the proper place, we desire simply to say here that we have been assured by the finest legal talent in Chicago, that the statements of legal disabilities are wholly untenable, and can be so proved. Furthermore, be it stated that both the preparation and proposed publication of the article were known by the Temple trustees, who, desirous of preventing such erroneous statements in the public print, appealed to Mr. Hobbs' honor and chivalry in the following letter:

CHICAGO, Feb. 23, 1893.

Mr. J. B. Hobbs, City:

DEAR SIR:—We, the undersigned, knowing the interest that you have in the W. C. T. U. and all its great work, are surprised to learn that you have chosen the public press as a medium through which to attack one of the enterprises that has heretofore been adopted overwhelmingly as one of its legitimate lines of work.

We, the undersigned, members of the National W. C. T. U., and Temple Trustees, feeling that such a statement, calling in question the honesty and good faith of one of our honored workers, made in her absence, and while she is ill in California, as you are aware, come to you as a Christian brother to ask that you will order the article furnished to the Tribune, withheld, until Mrs. Carse has an opportunity to defend herself.

Very sincerely,

SUSAN S. FESSENDEN,
CLARA C. HOFFMAN,

To this appeal no answer has been vouchsafed, and no action taken, as proven by the published article. All friends of the cause will feel a righteous indignation at this unwarrantable attack upon a noble woman and a commendable enterprise, in view of the facts that it was made in the absence of both Mrs. Carse and Miss Willard, and at a time when there is no emergency whatever in Temple affairs, which were never so prosperous as now.

IT has long seemed to us that our unions, by their unsectarian character and representative aims, were fitted incidentally to furnish the incitement to noble enterprises closely related to our work, in which women who will not as yet engage in our direct temperance endeavor would gladly employ their steadily-arousing energies. In large cities we might call a meeting and do the preliminary work which would result in organizing the associated charities so beneficently operative in Philadelphia and Boston, or in the founding of an industrial and temporary home for girls; or in the inauguration of a citizens' league in the interest of the Sabbath and the protection of children from the liquor traffic, an enterprise which has had notable success in Chicago. We might go even beyond all this and petition municipal authorities to establish public fountains, free bathing houses and gymnasiums, all of which, conducing directly to improve sanitary habits in the public, would accomplish much toward diminishing the feverish and unnatural thirst for stimulants. Let us not insist that all shall work with us, but rather be sedulous in the endeavor so to increase the aggregate "enthusiasm of humanity," so to glorify the sentiment of other-hood as opposed to the sense of self-hood, that all may find the secret of a happy life in working somewhere.

I love a clamor where there is an abuse.

M. Renan, author of "The Life of Christ," has said one good thing at least, namely, he writes in his Memoirs as follows: "I have loved four women tenderly, my mother, my sister, my wife and my daughter. I think the judgment at the great day for men will be none other than the judgment of the women they have known, countersigned by God Almighty."

This testimony is from the wife of a distinguished man, and she "speaks by the book." "I know from my husband's experience that the 'public' is absolutely without mercy. Ministers insist on his speaking twice on Sunday, although he may have been speaking every night during the week. They mean no harm, but the moral is that everybody must protect himself, or he will not be protected from the demands that come to all those who can hold a pen or use a voice in the interest of the people."

The following unique introduction might give a hint to many a chairman who is at his wit's end to get through with that difficult experience. The formula we give was recently used on the other side of the water.

"It is known to many of us that when Gen. Grant was being nominated for the third term as President of the United States, that brilliant orator, Roscoe Conkling, began the historic speech in which he nominated the hero of the army in these words:

'If you ask us what his name is,
Our answer it shall be
He comes from Appomatox
And the famous apple tree.'

"To-night I would parody these lines after this fashion

'If you ask us what her name is,
Our answer it shall be,
She is the Temperance leader
In the land across the sea.'"

To disagree with gentleness is a far higher triumph of Christian grace than to be gentle just because we happen to agree; and to accept the will of the majority without dreaming of disunion, helps to educate us for the heavier strain on our steadiness of nerve which the duties of citizenship will ere long involve. Moreover, "the interchange of views on any given subject that is called out by a pointed and lively discussion is worth a shelf crammed full of pamphlets and reports."

Another pleasant venture for the winter evenings would be the organization of the Optimists' Club. Every one who attends must bring some tidings that are hopeful and cheering, some new fact or quotation, and each member shall be "sworn in" to take for his motto "We are saved by hope," and never to say a discouraging word to or of any other member under any circumstances. I hope the Y societies and others may take up the idea.

The word "Glory" has three significations in the Bible: Outward splendor, future brightness, inward illumination. The inward illumination of truth, which comes to us along the way, is part of the glorious inheritance of the saints, which Paul tells us about. To be glorified is to be spiritualized. We are spiritualized in this world in proportion to our self-mastery; in proportion as our bodies become subjugated by the spirit within them.

Miss Louise Manning Hodgkins, well known to our readers in literary and college circles, writes On Duty: "We are having fine temperance meetings in Boston this winter. THE SIGNAL has grown as if it were put out at compound interest in these last years." Miss Hodgkins' new book will be out in April and before that time she hopes to be on the other side of the Atlantic studying at Oxford for six months.

ON DUTY.

PEACE.

BY EVA KINNEY GRIFFITH.

In this rushing, hurrying, confusing life which we are living, with its intricate and complex duties crowding one upon another, the greatest boon sought after and the highest blessing to be attained is—peace.

Every body is searching for it, every one is longing for it, but few attain unto it.

"When we are married," say the young lovers, who are pestered with outside interference, "we shall have peace."

But the new home brings with it many cares and anxieties that are as harrowing as unexpected.

"When our new house is built and furnished," says the ambitious young housewife, "when the builders, painters, paper-hangers and decorators are all gone, we shall have peace."

Yet scarcely are they settled ere a fire burns them out, an unexpected payment cannot be made and a mortgage is foreclosed, sickness comes, or, if nothing worse happens, a host of visitors are announced, and the regular order of the peaceful home is interrupted with engagements, here and there, that entirely disarrange it.

"If only I were settled in my business," says another, "I could be so happy."

Being absolutely settled in any earthly plan is an impossibility. Continual change is the order of creation. Even the continents are not stable. The restless sea washes away the land on one shore to build it up on another. Earthquakes level mountains, land-slides fill up smiling valleys, rivers change their courses, storms destroy crops, brooks run dry, and nature is everywhere full of change. She knows no rest.

But man is ever sighing for the eternal calm. In his soul is an ideal, a conception of sweet peace that assures him of the reality, and for this reality he is ever sighing. When and how shall it be found? is the question he is always asking.

Not in outward circumstances can the answer to this question be obtained. The person that would have peace must look within. An inward calm is possible amid the confusing cares of everyday life, the persecutions of enemies, the excitement of war, or the inward pressure of earthly sorrow and grief.

The first necessity to this inward calm is a conscience void of offense toward God. Unforgiven sin and a desire to get rid of the upbraidings of conscience is the cause of much of the restlessness of life. The Christian who has his sins forgiven knows a peace that the world knows not of.

Faith is the next power that makes for peace. God loves us. He loves us more truly and tenderly than any earthly friend. He orders every change however small in our lives, and He loves us so well that not one change will ever come to us unless it is best for us. If we believe this, how calm we can be through a hundred interruptions to the regular order of our lives.

If we properly appreciate the relative value of the things of time and eternity it will help us to have peace. The Christian who realizes that he has a "mansion" in his Father's house being especially prepared for him will not be needlessly grieved because his house on earth is burned or otherwise destroyed. Nor can any loss of property on earth be deeply grievous to one whose "treasures are laid up in Heaven."

But last, not least, the greatest necessity to peace is a heart full of love toward our fellowmen. If we love the man who wrongs us more than we love ourselves we shall pity him for his sinfulness, but our peace will not be disturbed by his actions.

It is said that in mountainous countries travelers have noticed that where a great storm comes over a valley the birds fly upward until they are above the clouds. Here they sport and sing in the sunshine until the storm is over, when they descend to their usual haunts.

So when the storms of earth come to us all, if we learn in spirit to fly upward, we may learn to live in the sunshine of an eternal calm, even though our earthly life be full of storms and changes.

Chicago, Ill.

ANSWER me this question: Is it not as easy for the sea to carry the bulkiest ship as the seaweed or foam it flings on the shore? Is it not as easy for the affluent sun to bathe a mountain as a mole-hill in light? Is it not as easy for this vast earth to carry on its back an Alps as a grain of sand? Just so, believer, it is as easy for God to supply thy greatest as thy smallest needs, even as it was as much within His power to form a system as an atom—to create a blazing sun as to kindle a firefly's lamp.—Guthrie.

CONNECTICUT.

PLAINVILLE NEWS.

The union of this place gave a reception in the parlors of the Congregational church, January 20, which was a decided success. A large number of members and friends were present, notwithstanding the intensely cold weather.

Mrs. Moody, who for many years, was the loved and honored president, gave a little of the history contained in the souvenir spoon, from the gathering of the few earnest Christian women in the little Hillsborough church to the present time, when the entire globe is circled with the white ribbon. One of these spoons she presented, on behalf of the union, to Mrs. B. B. Warren, the present leader, as a token of appreciation and regard.

A program consisting of recitations and songs made the evening one of pleasure and profit.

I believe an occasional gathering like this, with its interchange of thought and feeling, promotes the good of the cause by imparting inspiration and strength to those who may be somewhat discouraged, because the results we hope and pray for do not immediately appear. Are we not, many of us, too often found in "Doubting Castle" instead of walking in the sunlight of perfect faith in God, believing that in His own glad time He will reign supreme, as He has a right "from the river unto the ends of the earth"?

Once more we have been called to record the death of one of our members, Mrs. Wm. Baldwin, who died January 25, after a short illness. She was an earnest worker in the Methodist Episcopal church and will be greatly missed by a large circle of friends.

One of our dear sisters has been called to mourn the loss of a devoted husband, who was stricken down at his place of business in Hartford. Our hearts go out in sympathy to the little sorrowing group in their hour of deep affliction.

The weekly meetings find the faithful few gathered for prayer, thus gaining strength to go out and do better service for the blessed Master.

NEW HAVEN COUNTY CONVENTION.

Although the Ansonia W. C. T. U. was only organized last March, Mrs. Pitblado, its president, thought it could entertain the county convention, and be greatly strengthened thereby, so an invitation was given and accepted. The convention was held in the Congregational church, the advocates of temperance being greeted with a pouring rain. Thirteen delegations were present and six officers; twenty-two delegates and fifteen visitors assembled in the church, which was decorated for the occasion with potted plants, the lady furnishing the plants being a white-ribboner and the pastor's wife.

Interesting reports of unions were supplemented by addresses from the Revs. Markioish, Dr. C. B. Pitblado and the pastor of the German Congregational church, who expressed themselves heart and hand with us in our work.

The speakers were Mrs. C. B. Forbes, state president, Mrs. C. H. FitzGerald, state superintendent of L. T. L. and Mrs. J. T. Ellis, of New Jersey, for the afternoon and evening.

In an easy, racy manner, Mrs. Forbes described the National W. C. T. U. at Denver and the farewells in Chicago to Miss Frances E. Willard and Lady Henry Somerset. Then she described the Temperance Hospital at Chicago, and urged our unions to contribute towards the fitting up of a room, until some of the delegates present pledged sums amounting to the five dollars desired. Next Mrs. J. T. Ellis captured the attention at the very outset, of not only the convention but the children of the Loyal Temperance Legion, who had marched into the church singing, "Onward we are marching, alcohol to fight," and had given us songs and recitations which inspired us all, and reflected great credit on their teachers and their superintendent, Miss Minnie Fielding. Then Mrs. FitzGerald gave a stirring speech to them and to us which must result in more interest in work for the young, in their education in temperance principles.

The Ansonia Loyal Temperance Legion is the most hopeful department of our work, and the membership has increased from twelve to eighty in eight months. Our union membership has also increased rapidly from thirty to nearly fifty in the same length of time.

WOODSTOCK VALLEY UNION.

This union became interested in a mission in New Haven and besides collecting some money for it, gave time and work till two sugar barrels of clothing had been prepared, containing 267 articles. Sixty of these articles were made new for little children. Two dollars has been sent to the Temperance Hospital in Chicago. They have also started a home department of Sabbath-school work with five assistants to circulate the pledge, credit cards and quarterlies. The union furnishes all the material. The field is large, covering three parishes. At Christmas time they sent a package of cake and candy with a large text card to the inmates of the poor farm.

The report from this work was most encouraging. There were at the table when the packages were carried in and one woman cried: "It is just like them, always doing good, they have been baptized, but that is not all." The poor creature's mind was a little deranged but her meaning is clear. Many wept, overcome by their feelings. One woman said, some time after, that the text on her card had helped her in washing dishes. The littles are what make the great total, and "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

STRATFORD ITEM.

Time speeds, and one by one the unions hold their annual meetings and review the year's work. The union named above had some interesting words to say for itself at its last yearly meeting held recently in the Methodist parsonage. The members number twenty-two; thirteen meetings were held, with August for vacation time; the attendance ranged from six to thirteen. Considerable literature has been distributed; petitions were circulated and signatures obtained. Literature on the license question was sent to every voter, but notwithstanding, the town voted license by only five majority. Flowers and messages of cheer were sent to members who were ill, and one in reduced circumstances was helped.

Several members assisted the Buell union, of Bridgeport, in distributing gifts in the jail in that city, and assisted in the services. At Christmas the union remembered its president and ex-president with Willard souvenir spoons. The free-will offering meeting brought in $10.02. Loyal Temperance Legion work has been carried on. Five dollars has been sent to Miss Pugh for the World's W. C. T. U. Their watchword is "Onward," and their motto:

"Let us then be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate,
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

The president delivered a delightful address, which reviewed the year's work in a most appropriate manner. Want of space alone prevents the reproduction of Mrs Bassett's paper in these columns.

ANTI-SALOON CONVENTION.

There was held in Middletown, January 17, in the M. E. church, the annual business meeting of the Connecticut temperance union. In the afternoon this meeting gave way to the anti-saloon convention which was held in the same place. An evening service followed at which time as in the morning and afternoon every moment was well filled with interesting and helpful reports and addresses. Rev. J. H. James, secretary of the C. T. U., presided. Our own state president, Mrs. C. B. Forbes, was present and occupied the platform for a short time. The W. C. T. U. and King's Daughters furnished a fine collation at noon and between the afternoon and evening service.

PORTLAND.

A reception was given by the W. C. T. U. at Temple of Honor hall the evening of February 9 and was attended very largely by members of the union, the Y and friends of both societies. The reception opened at eight o'clock and during the evening there were many callers. This is the first thing of the kind attempted by the local members, and it proved a great success. Mrs. Forbes, state, and Mrs. Marvin, county president, were present and made addresses. Refreshments were served and a pleasant time was had by those in attendance.

IMPORTANT ITEMS.

Our annual minutes are out and we are all proud of them. Could your readers see them they would realize that your reporter is only able to give a very faint idea of what Iowa women are doing to promote our sacred cause.

Our state president after a much-needed rest, will take the field the last of this month, visiting ten or twelve places in the fourth district, and then on to other appointments.

We were all stricken to the heart by the tidings of the sudden death of Mary Allen West. Every one but herself has reason to grieve, but while earth has lost heaven has gained.

Mrs. M. L. Wells, of Tennessee, has spoken to delighted audiences at several places, since my last report.

Miss Berenice Kerney is having fine success in organizing W's and Y's and L. T. L's. Her terms are only collection and entertainment. Her address is Plattsmouth, Neb.

New unions have been organized at Sandusky, Montrose, Keokuk, Oakville, Newport and Morning Sun.

40 Years the Standard.

Osage, the banner union of the fourth district, has opened headquarters in a prominent location. It has a membership of over seventy, including honoraries and new members are received at nearly every meeting.

A good work is in progress in Cerro Gordo county, where men and women who were bitterly opposed to our work a few months ago are now glad to lend a helping hand and proud to wear the white ribbon.

Washington county women having raised ninety-two dollars have decided to use the money in giving some poor men and women the benefit of treatment. Silver medal contests have been held at Fairview, Bethel and Letts.

A gold medal contest was held at Danville, February 3. Contestants were from Burlington, Middletown and Danville. It was a perfect success. A ten cent admittance fee was charged, and over thirty-three dollars were received. Willie Elliott, of Burlington, won the medal. The other contestants were presented with beautifully illustrated copies of Evangeline. The people are deeply interested in these contests.

Our Burlington workers are holding prayer-meetings in different parts of the city, in aid of those who do not attend church. Several conversions have encouraged the devoted band.

Iowa Prohibitionists have gained a grand victory over the foreign beer syndicate, at our state capital.

During the ten years in which we have had prohibitory laws, Des Moines has more than doubled its population, and has become the largest city in the world that has no saloon.

A city council of supposed Prohibitionists was elected against anti-prohibition candidates, but to the dismay of all good people throughout the state, this city council, by a vote of six to three, passed the "disorderly house" ordinance, a high license measure. But the patriotic mayor, Hon. C. C. Lane, vetoed the disgraceful ordinance in terms so forcible and convincing that it is not likely to be heard from again for some time, at least. We may be certain, however, that the British capitalists who now own the brewing interests in this country will not let us alone, and that nothing but constant vigilance will insure the safety of our priceless boys and girls.

'Tis pity, but 'tis true that there are those within our borders who would barter the souls of our youth for position, and for the brewers, blood-tarnished gold.

Some of our most influential Republican newspapers now say that the party has been pledged to execute the will of the people of Iowa, that it was faithful to this pledge so long as the people demanded state-wide prohibition, and now that they demand local option as shown by the results of the elections of 1889 and 1891 (when Republicans were defeated) that it should be faithful to it still.

Notwithstanding all this political sophistry the truth is that the people want prohibition now just as much as they did in 1884, when they gave a majority of 30,000 in its favor. They see its value in reduction of taxes, decrease of crime and in the unexampled prosperity and happiness that reign wherever the law is enforced.

The Republican gain last fall, bodes no good to prohibition, for it came from anti-prohibition localities, and is composed of men favoring the liquor traffic who have been wooed back to the party by the promise that prohibition shall be dropped. It remains to be seen whether this contract can be carried out.

If the next Republican State Convention shall be silent upon this vital issue, or declare for local option, the very elect who have clung to the party, in the honest belief that it was true to prohibition, will no longer be deceived by the vain tricks and dark ways of unscrupulous politicians, but will perceive that saint and saloon-keeper cannot vote the same ballot without sin.

The Iowa State Temperance Alliance will hold its seventeenth annual meeting in Des Moines, February 28 and March 1. This is a meeting of the greatest importance, as measures will be taken to thwart the effort being made to repeal our prohibitory law.

The executive committee of the alliance are regarded with great disfavor by whisky wire-pullers, because they courageously revealed the fact that plans were all laid to deliver our noble state into the hands of the greedy English beer syndicate before these traitors had prepared the people for it. It is hoped that there will be a large attendance of stanch temperance people at this alliance meeting.

Des Moines county unions have sent in fifty dollars on the one hundred pledged to the Temple. The untiring state president and treasurer "stir up the pure minds" of our women in regard to various matters.

Miss Frances Griffin, of Alabama, will give the month of March to service in Iowa. Terms, five dollars and collection. Unions desiring addresses from her will apply to their district presidents for further information.

The state superintendent of Temple work urges immediate and energetic action from every union and every member in order that Iowa's income from the Temple receipts may be increased. Superintendents of L. T. L. and literature departments give some inspiring suggestions to workers in their branches.

EASTERN WASHINGTON.

PROGRESSIVE WORK.

Having just completed a list of appointments in Whitman county, I have the following report to make: Absent from home fifteen days; traveled four hundred and nineteen miles; visited ten points; held seventeen meetings; organized one new union; re-officered two others that had ceased to meet; enrolled seventy-four new members and raised by collections and pledges, sixty-three dollars for state work.

Endicott, where the new union was organized, is a small town on the U. P. R. R., eighteen miles west of Colfax. We found good material here for a union and organized with ten members. Colfax is the county seat of Whitman county and a thriving little city. Here has been one of the most aggressive unions in our state. Last year this union volunteered to raise one hundred dollars for state work and raised it. We were sorry to find this union quite discouraged. Some of their most active members have moved away, others are aged and feeble and are no longer able to devote much time and energy to the work.

Sister Carley, one of the "tried and true," said, "We need a new leader." At the evening meeting six new members were received—among them a woman of experience in W. C. T. U. work who had recently moved there. We at once felt that the Lord had sent her there for a special work. We trust she will accept the situation and cheerfully enter the open door. At Guy, I found a small union of earnest women who were doing the best they could under many discouragements.

The work was new to them, as this union has been organized only a little more than one year. But they were anxious to learn. Two enthusiastic meetings were held at this point and twenty-five new members added to the union.

A large audience greeted us at Pullman at the evening meeting, but owing to the inclemency of the weather the next day, but few of the ladies got to the day meeting. We felt, however, that the meeting was a success as we found a capable young woman who was willing to reorganize and carry forward the L. T. L. work there, which had gone down.

Colton union was next visited. They are few in numbers, but brave of heart. They have recently bought two good lots on Main street, on one of which they have built a small dwelling for a member of the union. She is an old lady without relatives or means and the union cares for her. A good brother has donated a large frame building which they intend to move on to their corner lot and convert into a hall and reading-room. They are the first union in East Washington to move in this direction. We hope others will follow their example. Fourteen new members were added to Colton union.

Palouse City union had not met for some months. Two meetings were held here; six new members enrolled and the union re-officered. We expect to hear of this union doing good work in the future. Rosalia union, our next point, is small but active. Here we were pleased to see the L. T. L. out in force at the evening meeting, and their singing added much to the interest of the occasion.

Our next appointment was Garfield, but when we reached there we found so many other engagements ahead of ours that we had our appointment called in. Elberton union has been one among the best, but for some reason interest had waned and the union had not held a meeting for months. Two meetings were held here. With the union re-officered, and eight new members added, they start off with renewed zeal and a purpose to remain true to this holy cause. Altogether we feel that there is much to encourage us in this work.

AMANDA STRONG,
State President.

MICHIGAN ETCHINGS.

I begin my letter with a quotation from our state superintendent of narcotics, who had a fall early in the season, breaking her left arm. Now, she writes that a similar accident has befallen her husband, Rev. Mr. Bradley, of Hudson, and adds, "So here we are a one-armed family, but we are not disheartened, we are better off than many, and not being crippled in heart desires for humanity we are blessed."

Now it is the working and waiting of just such soldiers under Frances Willard that makes our victory sure.

Jackson in the third district has had additions to its union and been given a new impetus by the work of Dr. Tracy. Mrs. Lathrap says his talks to mothers and girls were very helpful. The county this city is in has a grand board of supervisors. For many years they have allowed a sum for carriage hire to take members of the W. C. T. U. to the county house for gospel teaching on Sunday. This year they have given in addition, fifteen dollars for literature and put in a library for the use of the inmates of the county house—at request of the W. C. T. U. They have also in this city, under the care of the W. C. T. U., what they call a Scientific Temperance Circle, at which the attendance is often seventy, meeting a want just beyond the L. T. L.

The superintendent of legislations and petitions is busy for us at Lansing. She sends me a leaflet for use among Catholics. "Conditions for Lent: To abstain from all intoxicating drinks. To keep out of the saloon, and to pray every day for the suppression of intemperance."

Among the live unions, Fenton, in the sixth district, compares favorably. They have just held their annual meeting, work in four departments, and have lecture and visiting committee. They recently offered money prizes to boys thirteen years of age and under, for solution of the problems given in columns of the Independent. The three prizes were won, and all others who competed received a copy of "Black Beauty." This paper referred to above devotes a column to our use on the very first page of each week's issue.

Adrian, second district, writes, "have lost six members by deaths and removal, had twenty-six additions and now number ninety." They take up fifteen departments, and I notice among their list of officers that of collector. Why not? This union also returns thanks to The Adrian Times for placing at their disposal, the past year, one half a column, in which they had temperance notes.

I quote: "The reports on all lines show life and activity." Four socials were held during the year at four different churches. The industrial home for girls is stationed here, and was, as we all know, the outcome of a lecture by Mary T. Lathrap, and the W. C. T. U. has a superintendent who visits them. She reports text-books in the hands of all pupils; in five rooms the Pathfinder series is used. A class takes up Steel's Physiology, she also takes magazines there. The superintendent of narcotics has done wonders. She has circulated the cigarette petition in the teachers' institute, getting forty names, those of all the physicians but three. She has also circulated the tobacco pledge securing three thousand names. Each department under the head of Temperance Notes, has done work that counts now and will tell hereafter.

Coldwater union, in third district, writes: "Once a quarter we hold gospel temperance meetings. Each month we hold a department meeting, the respective superintendent having program in charge, and we can say each meeting is more largely attended than the last, and an advertisement for the next."

In the annual meeting of the Michigan woman's state press association, Mrs. La Tour, our state superintendent, stood alone in advocating that the gates of the World's Fair be closed on Sunday. So you see in Michigan all our superintendents work with the "understanding also." Mrs. Voorhies, president of first district, has been visiting each of her unions, giving them a treat in her narration of the Denver trip and convention. Mrs. H. N. P. Blodgett, president of Willard union, Detroit, has written a very valuable paper, "What has the W. C. T. U. done for the world?"

Manton union: During the past month we have held two regular and two special meetings, a supper, one parliamentary drill, one evangelistic meeting, organized a union at Haire and sent our delegate to the district convention.

From Muskegon, the place of our next state meeting in May, Carse union writes: "We are killing two birds with one stone by holding parliamentary drills and by discussing the various phases of the woman question. Our gospel temperance meetings are gaining friends among thoughtful people." Manistee has held a mite-box social. Onekama, a prize contest and an equal rights meeting, the latter addressed by Rev. Millard and Ella S. Hopkins. Bear Lake has meetings so interesting with such full houses, that it sometimes necessitates the use of wash benches and ironing boards as seats. Their L. T. L. is very flourishing.

Miss L. J. Newcomb has been since October in Ohio, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Canada. This month she comes to Michigan, remaining until June. Her first course of lessons is at Grand Rapids among the teachers. She has five classes, each having one lesson a week for fifteen weeks. This is a rare opportunity for any one desiring to prepare for teaching.

A letter from the twelfth district, speaks of the work moving steadily onward. They are fortunate to have and hold their Y's.

Two of their district superintendents are among them. Escanaba union is making an effort to build a reading-room for boys. Their card sent out, soliciting a "quarter," is unique from a nautical point of view: "Lying upon Quarter deck on life's ocean, the last Quarter of this century, I received your modest request for a quarter, etc." Mrs. Law, their president, has been much in Minnesota, winning golden opinions from her auditors.

I heard the president of the ninth district say a wise thing: "My county presidents understand their work so well and my thought in the work, and I never do their work, thus if anything should happen to me there would be no break, the systematized work would go on." Sisters, we are working to teach individual responsibility. I ask in all seriousness, Have we each learned the lesson?

The Evart Y's have held a poverty social. The union, in the language of an outsider, "is a power." Our missionary, Rev. Alfred Kellerman, is doing good work in lumber camps, preaching, establishing Sunday-schools, giving away testaments and Bibles. He reports kind receptions, and doors opened which seemed closed last winter. He is in great need of gospel hymns. Mrs. Holman, who has charge of this department, uses with great force the word now, for this you see is largely winter work.

Mrs. P. J. Howard of the eleventh district writes: "I have held nine meetings, taking in some new members, organized three new unions, one L. T. L." Their printed report shows active work upon all lines.

Mrs. G. S. Barnes for her department says: "No better work can be done for Sunday-schools than to get them to subscribe for temperance papers."

Our executive board meeting has just been held at Bay City. Our coming state convention at Muskegon, Hackley Park Hall, petitions to send to the legislature, and our twenty-nine departments were thoughtfully considered, discussed, and action taken thereon in our three days' meeting. Three new departments were taken up and superintendents elected. Labor and capital, Mrs. S. E. Emery; Sabbath observance, Mrs. Annie Andrews; literature, Mrs. Caroline Humphrey.

At Crystal Falls, in twelfth district, God has stood revealed as leading this host. "A saloon-keeper converted, gave his store to be used as a reading-room and hall and all the furniture including a piano. It was formally dedicated January 20; the clergymen were all present. The ladies and the bartender circulated the pledge, securing thirty-five signers."

We of the sixth district have lost a valued worker by removal, Mrs. Nellie Ballard, of Lansing, and congratulate the first district for the accession of a member tried and true.

The president of Ingham county writes: "With constant persistence for four years we now have Loyal Temperance Legions in our schools." Williamston union is increasing in numbers. Mrs. M. M. Maybee, of Mason, gave a helpful address on 'Woman and Temperance,' securing three new members."

In our last Michigan Union was an article on "New Year's Meditations," by Mrs. Boise.

I close my letter with the following thought:

I doubt not that God has greater responsibilities for women in the future, and that when that time shall come His providential movements will indicate His will as clearly as was His call to a crusade against the saloon. In the meanwhile, while we are not in power, let us avail ourselves more fully of the promised power of God, and thus prove ourselves worthy of a call to political power.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

AFTER a month's campaign of intense excitement, the W. C. T. U. and Prohibitionists of Columbus, Miss., on January 30, closed the saloons by petition of a majority of the citizens. This leaves the county "dry."

LOUISVILLE, Ky., unions are increasing their membership weekly, and the work is being pushed in all departments. The Central union has been distributing clothing and food to the suffering poor during the cold weather.

A LOCAL union was organized at Danville, Ill., last October which now numbers twenty-two members, holding weekly meetings. Literature, evangelistic and social purity departments have been adopted and efficient superintendents appointed.

A NEW union, a prodigious infant W. C. T. U., numbering 165 members is reported from Hopkinsville, Ky. Another of thirty-five is at Mayfield. Both are composed of the very best women in the community and great results are anticipated.

A FRIEND suggests to those who have temperance books, papers or other religious literature, that the workers among the Indian tribes are always in need of such material. Mrs. A. R. Corson, Genito, Powhatan county, Va., and Miss Fannie Taylor, Pleasant Grove, Utah, will both use good books and papers to advantage.

A JUNIOR prohibition club of Georgia, whose president is Miss Elva Peters, of Timothy, numbers one hundred and fifty-two pledged members of whom its earnest vice-president, W. H. Welch, of Dunwoody, writes, "We are bound to succeed, for the young boys and girls are disgusted with intoxicating drink and its habits."

REV. DR. KNOX, Mrs. N. H. Knox, his wife, formerly president of the W. C. T. U. of New Hampshire, and Miss Mason, preceptress, all members of the faculty in Red River University, Dakota, wear the white ribbon in their classes and and all the time. If all our beloved "educators" would do likewise it would tell greatly on the habits and opinions of their students.

THE friends of Mrs. E. H. Griffith, for many years a resident of Fairport and Rochester, N. Y., who organized the Monroe county W. C. T. U. and was its president for ten years will be pained to learn of her deep affliction in the loss of her youngest daughter, Charlotte, who was a promising young student in the Chicago University.

THE Wilmore, Ky., W. C. T. U., under the lead of its enthusiastic president, is doing good work. Temperance literature is freely distributed in the community. The regular monthly meetings of the union are made interesting by recitations, readings, impromptu speeches and music, in addition to the regular business exercises. A Demorest contest was held recently, which resulted in much good.

MISS CLARA PARRISH, the efficient National Y organizer, starts March 1 on an eastern trip, stopping to lecture for the banner Y at Toledo, O., on Sunday, March 5. Points in the states of New York, Delaware and a convention at Washington, D. C. are on her schedule. Unions would do well to secure the services of Miss Parrish, who is an able and attractive worker among both W's and Y's. Address, Paris, Ill.

THE "Open Letter" of our Jennie Smith to the officials, agents and all employés of the railroads of the United States and territories expresses to those who labor so faithfully for the safe conduct of the traveling public, for the transmission of the mails and the transportation of baggage, the gratitude and the interest of the W. C. T. U. in their welfare, urging them to become total abstainers "for God and home and native land."

THE L. T. L. and Band of Hope souvenir spoon is the design of Mrs. Ada H. Kepley, of Effingham, Ill., a loyal and active W. C. T. U. worker and editor of The Friend of Home. The spoon is emblematic in design and will impress the story of the temperance cause upon the child. It was prepared to make a fund to carry on temperance work. Fifteen cents is allowed to every seller of the one dollar spoon and twenty-five cents on the more expensive ones. This will help the children to raise the dimes for the Willard fountain and funds for the Temple or the children's ward in the National Temperance Hospital. Write to Mrs. Kepley, Effingham, Ill.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. TREASURY NOTES,

White-ribbon workers will be glad to know that $122.19 was received in response to the treasurer's appeal for thank-offerings. Of this sum, four dollars and eighty-two cents came from one of our English superintendents, thirty-one dollars and fifteen cents from Canada and $286.22 from the United States. The treasurer, herewith, desires to express her gratitude to all those who so kindly remembered the great needs of the work.

Up to the present date, affiliation fees have been received from fifteen countries, but with the exception of the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada, these, in no instance, amounted to twenty dollars. It is, however, only just to call attention to the fact that many of these foreign unions have sent more than the half cent per capita fee required by the constitution of the World's Union. Notably, one island union sent ten cents per capita. If every white-ribbon woman on this continent contributed ten cents there would be no need to ask for special offerings.

Just now the needs of the work are great. Foreign postage bills are heavy items and the arrangements already so fully made for a World's convention in June must now be cancelled and new plans projected and carried out. There is, also, an enormous amount of correspondence connected with the circulation of the World's Petition. All this means a large expenditure for salaries of secretaries, stationery, printing, postage and clerical assistants. For the twelve months ending in January the running expenses of the World's W. C. T. U. (not counting missionary work) averaged $248.90 per month. So far, money has come in various ways so that the bills have been paid with sufficient promptness, but there is only a small surplus for the coming months and the treasury needs replenishing.

You have read the letters from Japan and understand how very desirable it is that some one be sent there to continue the work so well begun by Miss West. The needs of China are also pressing, and a lady should at once be sent to that country. Miss Palmer is working valiantly in South Africa, and writes of many ways in which money would help her work and make it more efficient. How can we supply all these needs? One good American lady has just gladdened the treasurer's heart by sending her one hundred dollars for missionary work. Cannot others whom God has blessed with riches do likewise? Two ways of helping are open to all:

First.—Let every white-ribbon woman try to interest at least one of her temperance "brothers-in-law" and secure from him a donation to this work as a part of his celebration of this Columbian year.

Second.—Let her also, while not lessening in any way her proposed gifts to local, county, state, provincial or National work, see if she cannot find a little space for "self-denial" during the week called by that name and give the money thus obtained to the World's W. C. T. U. It is quite true that to some "self-denial" is the accustomed practice already carried to its fullest extent. Perhaps these sisters can think of some way to earn a few extra pennies, and certainly they can pray most earnestly that the Master may put it into the hearts of others to furnish the needed funds.

One thing more; let us be orderly in sending gifts to the World's treasury. Donations from all local unions in organized countries should go, through the regular channels, to the treasurer of each Nation and be sent by her to the World's treasurer. In the United States, for example, all donations from local unions should come, as the fees do, through Miss Pugh, the treasurer of that Nation. There is a double advantage in observing this rule.

First.—All sums given by the unions in any country will then be entered on the books of the treasurer for that country and the amounts will be included in her annual report. If sent directly to the World's treasurer this cannot be done.

Second.—By observing this rule, much expense will be saved the World's treasury. For instance: American postal notes are not used in Canada and cannot be cashed there. American money is not in use there and local checks have to be collected. All this necessitates expense for brokerage which might be greatly lessened if the money came in large sums by bank drafts, bills of exchange or international money orders sent by the treasurer of the National W. C. T. U. Please remember that "a penny saved is a penny earned" and if your country is organized, send through the regular channels to the treasurer of your National W. C. T. U. asking her to forward to

LEGISLATION AND PETITIONS.

To the State Superintendents:

As the general assemblies of many states are now in session, it is important that our legislative superintendents in every state fully understand their powers and duties, and that they adopt the wisest methods by which to secure desired legislation.

As to the powers and duties of a state superintendent of legislation and petitions, she should introduce such prohibitory measures as are ordered by the state executive committee.

The legislative work desired by other departments in behalf of their own special measures is not under the charge of the superintendent of legislation and petitions unless by special request. Other departments will desire legal help in framing bills and will naturally turn to her and quite frequently ask her to plan the campaign with them, but she ought to wait till asked and not institute a campaign of her own.

In the framing of bills, one cannot be too careful. It is advisable to secure the opinions of the ablest jurists of the state, not because the lawyers know it all, but because an able lawyer will go through a bill with such care that if passed by the legislature it will never be ineffective by reason of obscurity or unconstitutionality. Where there are women attorneys in sympathy with the work, they might make valuable superintendents of this department. Their legal training should have made them faithful and teachable, which after all, is a more important condition of success than brilliancy.

Question blanks and literature have been sent to all state superintendents as far as known. Others can be supplied by writing me. Where no superintendents are yet appointed, state presidents are asked to secure some capable worker on whom we can depend.

As to methods by which legislators can be influenced to vote for the desired bills, opinions differ. Some prefer a large public meeting in the state house which, by its magnitude, may impress the legislators. Others who have equal experience in legislative work, say the former plan arouses the enemies as well as the friends and that a quiet campaign is more effective.

The work of this quiet campaign will consist largely in securing the writing of personal letters to every senator and representative. A politician, deaf to all eloquence and logic, will experience an early change of heart, if sufficient letters pour in from his watchful constituency. Making a friendly call on a legislator when he goes to his home to spend Saturday and Sunday is also valuable. In these interviews many convincing arguments can be poured into his ear, which, if written on paper, would soon be plunged into the obscurity of the waste-basket.

Nor is work with petitions in vain, for the men who have spit upon the petitions of former years have not all returned to the present legislatures, some, alas, having gone up higher to Congress. With one-half or two-thirds of some legislatures made up of new men, many a member has had so little experience, he will treat a petition with respect, and read down the list of names from his district with great interest. To insure this interest, it is wise to send to the members the petitions from their respective districts gradually, having them introduced a few at a time all through the session. It keeps them from forgetting as they would if 20,000, 50,000 or 100,000 names were presented at once.

The securing of signatures to petitions can be made of great value if the canvasser will carry a variety of literature and get every hard case, who refuses to sign the petition, to agree to read the leaflet answering his particular objection. This gives an excellent excuse for tract distribution and has been tried in our Illinois suffrage work with success.

The press should be utilized in sending all over the state, copies of the desired bill. Parlor-meetings should be held to discuss the new measure. Public gatherings should be addressed and urged to indorse the bill.

We must not forget the duty resting on all of us to help increase the length of the World's Petition. Its like has never before been conceived and the good it may do in its journey from nation to nation cannot be predicted.

CATHARINE WAUGH MCCULLOCH,
National Superintendent of Legislation and Petitions.
1116 The Rookery, Chicago.

NARCOTIC ITEMS.

Thirty-six states and the District of Columbia have laws forbidding the sale of tobacco or cigarettes to minors. The petitions to the last Congress resulted in the adoption of the following report from the committee on epidemic diseases:

"In the light of such information as it has been able to obtain from scientists in medical profession and sanitarians, your committee is of the opinion that the use of tobacco in any form is injurious to the physical condition of man, and cigarette smoking is more injurious, especially to youths, than the use of tobacco in any other form, and the medicated cigarette is more than the pure tobacco.

"The committee is satisfied that the cigarette is an evil, but it is equally satisfied that Congress has no constitutional power to prohibit the manufacture or sale of cigarettes in the states. The state legislatures alone possess that power, and these petitioners should look to the legislatures of their respective states for the remedy they seek, and when the states shall have prohibited the manufacture and sale of the cigarette within their limits, the committee ventures to express the opinion and the hope that Congress will prohibit the importation from foreign countries and the manufacture and sale of cigarettes in the District of Columbia and in the territories of the United States, which in the opinion of the committee, is the only territory within which Congress has the constitutional power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of cigarettes, however injurious they may be."

More than 25,000 names were sent to Congress. Many of the petitions were useless because they did not give the name of the town and state where they were secured. However, the petitioning has aroused great interest, and the following state legislatures have taken up the question: Alabama, Washington, New York, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Minnesota and Kentucky.

The important work to be done by this department is securing the indorsement of organizations to the petitions against the smoking compartment on the palace cars. Send to me for petitions.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL NOTES.

Mrs. Green and Miss Ida Clothier, of Manitou, Col., were callers at the hospital recently. It is good for the friends to call at this place of refuge, where the sick are made well by nature's curatives, made into medicines by man's skill, but into which no alcohol enters. These friends were very much interested in the work, and Mrs. Green gave a very pleasing chalk talk to the nurses and patients who were able to gather in the parlors.

Christmas, that time of the year when hearts open and overflow in thankfulness to the great Giver of all for the good that there is in the world, brought many remembrances to the hospital from friends in different parts of the country. Among these was a quilt bearing the following note: "Presented by Grandma White of Garrison, Butler county, Nebraska; grandma is between seventy and eighty years of age and has been paralyzed for a number of years. She is interested in the temperance movement and would like to know more of the hospital and its works." Could anything be more beautiful than the work of these aged hands and the mind longing to serve the wants of humanity?

"Age is opportunity no less,
Than youth itself though in another dress,
And as the evening twilight fades away,
The sky is filled with stars invisible by day."

Would that it were in our power to draw the curtain of distance aside, so that these saintly eyes could see the pleasant parlors, the office where the patients await the physician, the rooms where patients are being cared for by nurses and physicians; if this could be we know she would realize the atmosphere of truth and home resting over this hospital and say, "This is well."

A physician writes: "Will you kindly cite me to some means of information in regard to your method of treating disease without alcohol? Of putting up tinctures, in fact, all or any of the means of dealing with disease without the use of alcohol in some form. I am greatly interested in the work and would gladly use all means of doing away with the drug if I can find something as useful to take its place."

This indicates that the medical world is beginning to search for a substitute for alcohol, and whenever an intelligent and determined investigation is made, the resources of nature are so wide that success meets the effort. The physicians of the hospital are glad to respond to such letters and give all the information possible.

Our Library Table.

THE STORY OF MARY WASHINGTON by Marion Harland, is an interesting historical narrative of the mother of the nation's first president, from the first obtainable facts of the baby girl, Mary Ball, to the last days of the revered Madam Washington.

Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston and New York.

LITTLE COMRADE MINE, by Martha Burr Banks, author of "Princess Dandelion's Secret," is a beautiful story of a pure and beautiful child-life. Joyce, the child heroine, is one of a band of "comrades." Joyce had a dear brother, "Ric." She was telling a little friend one day about how to be a comrade: "But just before Ric went away," continued Joyce, "he told me that all the world was one big family, and that all the people in it were brothers and sisters; and he said that we must forget our own troubles, and try to get into the lives of others, and then we should find comrades enough, even if we couldn't be comrades for each other . . . then we thought that it would be a good idea for us each to see how many persons we could find who had trials, but who were good and helpful just the same, and we could all work together. . . Listen, Polly, don't you hear the sea now? This is the way it goes: 'Be patient! be patient! be patient! Forget your own trials, and get into others' lives and do what you can.'"

D. D. Merrill Co., Publishers, 44 and 45 Bible House, New York.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE LEAGUE'S ANNUAL for 1893 is a pamphlet of over two hundred pages, containing the most complete information of the temperance work accomplished in Great Britian during the past year, together with valuable statistics, chronicle of temperance events, brief obituaries of prominent temperance workers and a full directory of temperance organizations. This annual is a good exponent of a grand work. It may not be out of place to quote a paragraph from the report of licensed retreats for inebriates: "The reclamation of a female drunkard is often spoken of as beyond hope, and the committee began their task with a keen sense of its difficulty. But they ventured to hope in the grace of God, and not wholly to despair of human nature. They have been surprised to discover by practical experience how erroneous is the popular view. They have ample proof that their hope was well grounded, and that the plan of the retreat was well judged. The methods adopted are entire abstinence from strong drink, strict regularity of life, personal sympathy with the weak, constant and cheerful employment and a religious influence always present and often directly urged. It may be noted that although almost all the patients were drinkers up to the time of admission, the sudden removal of the accustomed stimulant did not in any case prove harmful; on the contrary, the appetite, the digestive powers and the general health have rapidly improved."

Edited by Robert Rae, secretary to the League. Published by the National Temperance League Publication Depôt, 33 Paternoster Row, E. C. London.

THE DIVINE ART OF PREACHING. This most valuable work is by Arthur T. Pierson, whose writings are becoming widely known and receiving almost universal commendation. None but one who understood the divine art of preaching could speak as does this author, authoritatively, helpfully, masterfully. The book is one that may be read with profit by preachers of the Word both young and old, as well as those who are preparing for the pulpit. Dr. Pierson does not content himself with generalities upon this subject, but attacks it systematically, dividing it into topics and giving each one careful consideration. The cream of the book lies in the last chapter entitled, "Communing with the Spirit." "Oh, for a new era of preaching," says the author, "that is biblical in the highest sense, and spiritual in the grandest sense, because not only identified with a spiritual character and life, but because it is essentially a spiritual product—a product of the Holy Spirit's indwelling and outworking! . . . The power that melts men's wills into God's is not a human gift, but a Divine grace. For such power we must wait before Him in the secret place, and if we are to pierce to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, we must wait until He makes our quiver full of arrows, pointed and barbed by the Spirit Himself. No time will be lost for preparation, which is spent in that first of all preparations, PRAYER. This is the preparation which prepares. All spiritual power runs back for its source and fountain to the mercy seat!"

AMERICA'S IDEAL RAILWAY TRAIN FOR THE INAUGURATION.

A duplicate is being constructed for exhibition at the World's Fair as the most complete passenger train ever conceived. The original departs daily from Chicago at 5 p. m. over the Pennsylvania Lines with Pullman Perfected Safety Vestibule Dining, Library, Sleeping and Parlor Cars, on which are all conveniences, including barber shop, bath, stenographer, stock report bulletin, waiting maid for ladies and children. Low rate excursion tickets to the Inauguration will be honored on this magnificent train. Arrange through H.R. Dering, A. G. P. Agt., 248 Clark St., Chicago, to enjoy the luxury of a trip on the finest railway train in service in America.

CHEAP RATES TO THE INAUGURATION.

For the inauguration of Cleveland and Stevenson at Washington on March 4th, excursion tickets, reading via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, "The Picturesque Route," will be placed on sale at the ticket offices of principal railroads of the west, as well as at the ticket offices of the Baltimore and Ohio Company. The fare from Chicago will be $17.50 for the round trip. These tickets will be sold from February 28th to March 3d, inclusive, and will be valid for return journey until March 8th, inclusive.

The Baltimore and Ohio is the shortest route to Washington from nearly all points west. Its trains are vestibuled from end to end, and carry Pullman sleeping cars.

No railroad in America is better equipped than the B. & O. to transport with dispatch, safety and comfort, the large crowd which will visit Washington to witness the inauguration ceremonies. Its long experience in transporting crowds to former inaugurations, G. A. R. Encampments, Knights Templar Conclaves, and similar gatherings, on an extensive scale, will prove most valuable in arranging for the coming inauguration. For more detailed information as to rates, time of trains, etc., apply to L. S. Allen, Asst. Gen'l Passenger Agent, The Rookery, Chicago, or O. P. McCarty, Asst. Gen'l Passenger Agent, Cincinnati, O.

Signal Notes.

IN Paris ten thousand people exist by begging.

THERE are fewer Chinese paupers and criminals on Blackwell's Island than any other nationality.

THE Salvation Army helped to make happy five thousand poor and destitute in their shelters in London on Christmas Day.

THE Manchester, England, W. T. Association and Police Court mission has thirteen branches in different districts of the city.

TEN thousand women annually committed to prison for drunkenness in Great Britain is not a pleasant state of affairs in a Christian civilized country.

A VETERAN missionary in China states that college trained men are needed as missionaries, for the literary class of Chinese are well read men.

THE English women will have on exhibition in the Columbian Fair a collection of portraits of famous women beginning with St. Eadgitha who died in 984.

A TERRIBE increase of twenty-five per cent, in arrests for crime is noticed for the past year in Massachusetts, of which increase sixty-seven per cent was for drunkenness.

IT is said that recently discovered papers prove that Tucson, Arizona, is older by twelve years than San Augustine, Texas, which has always had the honor of being the oldest city.

WITH but few exceptions, all the children of Port Isaac, a Cornish fishing village, belong to the Band of Hope. A unique feature is that many remain members even after they grow up.

THERE is no need to be drunk to be under the influence of wine. The man who takes a little and will not give it up is as much controlled by it as if he was an habitual drunkard.—John Wanamaker.

A MASSACHUSETTS mayor believes he has solved the problem of the control of the liquor traffic, by fining every rum-seller five dollars for every conviction of drunkenness. It is feared that there would be but few convictions.

A BRANCH of the New Century Club for women, in Philadelphia, is called the committee for the legal protection of women. They have an office and give hearings to applicants on Saturdays and one other evening during the week.

A CONVERTED saloon-keeper, in addressing a boys' temperance society, warned them against entering a saloon under any pretext whatever. There was danger in it for he had seen them come in with friends and gradually they would be induced to take lemonade or cider and something stronger inevitably followed.

The New York Wine and Spirit Gazette remarked lately in regard to Cleveland's election, "He knows he could not have been elected without their (the liquor dealers') active support, and if he is wise, he must know that the success of his administration depends upon recognizing Tammany Hall, whose main strength the liquor dealers are."

Three Signs of Consumption.

An attack of Pulmonary Consumption is always preceded by three danger signals: The rattle-snake seldom strikes its fatal blow until after its note of warning has been given; so with Consumption; the attack of this dread and insidious foe is preceded by. First, Emaciation—loss of flesh without sufficient sick symptoms to account for it. Second, a Cough; slight, perhaps; "a mere habit," the patient says, which he "can and must prevent"; doubly ominous if continuing through warm weather. Third, Unequal Depression beneath the collar bones. Tubercles almost always invade one lung, and at its apex. This one soon contracts, and the flesh above it shows a greater depression than over the other.

These are the signals? Where is the remedy? Will any drug supply it? Observation (and too often experience) makes you answer no. More than 20 years ago we said that our Compound Oxygen would help in a manner and to an extent far exceeding any other agent known to man. We say so still; but it is not our word only now. Scientists admit it; physicians prescribe and take it; and, better still, thousands of people everywhere, stepping aside from the crowded path of hoary failure, have tried it themselves, and are living to-day, glad to tell of its great power to rebuild the system, the gradual consumption of which it is that we call Consumption.

If a person has seen one or all of these signals; if he desires health rather than sympathy; restoration rather than amelioration; if he is so constituted that he can believe the evidence of others, we invite him to write us a plain statement of his case. We will send him, without any expense, an honest medical opinion, at the same time inclosing an account of the discovery of Compound Oxygen and of its mode of cure.

To be well informed on this subject has been life itself to many physically needy people. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

AND WORLD'S WHITE RIBBON.

FOR GOD AND HOME AND EVERY LAND — WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOUNDED 1883

"THOU HAST GIVEN A BANNER TO THEM THAT FEAR THEE; THAT IT MAY BE DISPLAYED BECAUSE OF THE TRUTH."

Volume XIX. CHICAGO, March 9, 1893. Number 10

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U., sending the same through the authorized channels to the treasurer of her nation, asking her to send it to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The fifty-second Congress held its last session, March 4.

About three hundred persons were presented at Queen Victoria's drawing-room last week.

The large exports of gold to Europe during the past week have made business men anxious.

The question of international arbitration was favorably discussed in the German Reichstag, last week.

Enormous loss of property from floods is reported from Western Russia and Eastern Germany.

Emperor William and the chancellor Caprivi, are firmly endeavoring to pass the army bill in the Reichstag.

Hippolyte Adolph Taine, the French author and philosopher, died in Paris, March 5, numbering sixty-four years.

The South Dakota senate has passed a bill conferring on women the right to vote at school and municipal elections.

The inauguration of President Cleveland took place at Washington, D. C., March 4, amid the usual parades and festivities.

The committee on judiciary of the Illinois senate has reported favorably on the bill to extend township and municipal suffrage to women.

The motion to recede from the position taken by Congress regarding Sunday closing of the World's Fair was lost in the Senate, Friday, by a vote of 123 to 141.

The bill to resubmit the prohibitory laws of North Dakota is virtually lost by the overwhelming vote of the senate referring it to the committee on temperance.

The legislative assembly of Arizona, has passed a bill which it is conceded will pass the senate and also receive the governor's signature, authorizing woman suffrage in the territory.

A bill providing for inspectors, half of whom are to be women, and regulating the age and length of working days of persons employed in "sweat-shops" has been introduced in the Illinois legislature.

The Kansas Populists have quietly taken their seats in the legal house of representatives, order having been restored, although much soreness remains, and there is little prospect for active legislation.

The grand jury at Chicago have just indicted on a charge of murder, four of the employés of the Pittsburg, Ft. Wayne and Chicago railroad for negligence which caused a fatal railroad accident not long ago.

The joint resolution providing that an amendment to the state constitution giving equal suffrage to women be submitted to a vote of the people at the general election of 1894, passed the Kansas house of representatives last week.

The citizens of New Jersey have united in a movement, demanding the repeal of the race-track bills and the suppression of gambling in all its forms, holding mass-meetings and sending large delegations of citizens to the state capital during the week past.

ONE of the very best methods of extending the total abstinence propaganda is to secure in various philanthropic and reform societies of women a total abstinence section, inducing its members to wear the white ribbon, observe the noon hour of prayer and circulate W. C. T. U. literature; this section to be invited to send a fraternal delegate each year to the National convention of the W. C. T. U.

ONE of the best phases of the temperance question in England just now is that when the Direct Veto is obtained,—and it seems quite sure to be given to the people before the year is out,—it will be backed up by the municipal ballot for women, and thus local option will have a far better chance to win than it has ever known in the Republic. They may be slow to move and so they are, but our British cousins are very apt to "come in strong on the home stretch."

A GLORIOUS victory for Sabbath observance was gained last week in Washington. The committee on inaugural arrangements were preparing for Sunday concerts to be given by the Marine band. A protest was started by several Christian and temperance workers, and carried by two prominent pastors to Secretaries Noble and Tracy, the former of whom issued a peremptory refusal to the committe for the use of the Pension building, and the latter as decidedly denied the services of the Marine band. President Cleveland has already expressed his unqualified disapproval of Sunday concerts, at which the entire Christian world will rejoice.

THE young people of Chicago are setting an example to the city fathers that ought to bring the blush of shame to their cheeks. The young people's societies of Christian Endeavor of the West Side of the city inaugurated, last Sunday night, a month's temperance crusade led by P. A. Burdick, of New York. There will be meetings every week-day as well as Sunday evening, and judging from the first one, they will be largely attended and enthusiastically carried out. Mr. Burdick is eminently practical in all his methods, and the pledge will be presented to every member of the audience at each meeting. The ministers are coöperating heartily and great good is expected to accrue to the city government, as this crusade will continue to the very eve of the municipal election.

A WRITER in the Fortnightly Review claims, in defense of vivisection, and apparently his claim is established, that lockjaw, which heretofore has been incurable, has been brought under control through discoveries made by vivisection. From this he argues that other diseases will in like manner be robbed of their terrors. That some beneficial results have been obtained from vivisection, no intelligent person can deny and we are inclined to believe that could the practice be regulated by law so that anæsthetics should always be administered, it might become a great aid to medical science without the terrible moral degradation which accompanies the practice at present. But it is beyond doubt that vivisection as at present practiced entails excruciating and unnecessary suffering upon animals and a moral injury upon the men who practice it entirely outweighing any physical benefits accruing therefrom. When the vivisector is rendered so oblivious to suffering that he comes even to take delight in inflicting it upon his helpless human patients, and animals are frozen to death for the mere sake of proving that they suffer in the process, the evils of vivisection clearly exceed its benefits to such a degree that it ought, in that form, to be prohibited. If some plan can be devised by which vivisection can be so regulated by law as to restrain its practice to cases in which some real purpose can be attained by it and then anæsthetics always be used, the opposers of vivisection will probably withdraw their objections.

IN the midst of the fierce contest between capital and labor which shows no signs of drawing to a close, such instances as the one given below are at least worthy of consideration. Mr. C. G. Conn, a manufacturer of band instruments in Elkhart, Ind., conducts his business on the coöperative plan, dividing annually, the profits of the business between himself and his workmen. January 30, he made the usual annual distribution. Fourteen thousand, six hundred dollars was the share of his one hundred and three employés. Five managers, elected from among the employés, received $1,010 each. The remainder was distributed among three classes in sums of sixty, ninety and one hundred and fifty dollars each. All this, of course, was in addition to their regular wages. Coöperation has been tried in all kinds of business and its success has been such as to warrant a general adoption of the method.

CHICAGO is preparing for a religious revival this summer as well as a great Exposition. Many churches have decided to hold week-day services and scores of pastors will relinquish their usual long vacations and abide by their post, ready for the great opportunity of soul-saving. But aside from these long established altar-fires, it is deemed vital to the cause of the religion of Jesus to establish gospel headquarters near the Exposition. Hence it has been decided, as already announced in these columns, to erect a model Sunday-school building, near one of the principal entrances to the grounds. This building will cost thirty thousand dollars and gifts are solicited from friends everywhere. Chicago Sunday-school workers will contribute one-third of the amount. The time is short. Send contributions to R. W. Hare, 200 Market St., Chicago. Mr. Moody and other noted evangelists will hold gospel services in this building every day in the week during the entire time of the Exposition.

THE event of the past week was the inauguration of Grover Cleveland and Adlai Stevenson as President and Vice-president of the United States. It is doubtful if Washington was ever so crowded with visitors at any previous inaugural. Interest in the ceremony was intense, and thousands of people were debarred from witnessing the outdoor exercises because of the exceedingly stormy weather. Already propositions are advanced for placing inauguration day the last instead of the first of March, in order to secure a milder atmosphere. Newspapers of all political faiths have published such extended accounts of the ceremonies that our readers are fully informed as to the details. We wish simply to emphasize the fact of the almost universal good-will shown to both the out-going and incoming President. So far as the reporters have been able to learn, and what they don't find out about such matters is of little consequence, there has been no bitterness from the dethroned President and his friends towards the President-elect and his friends, and all feelings of joy and exultation on the other side have been freely tempered with expressions of admiration and sympathy for the retiring magistrate. The entire campaign, concluding with last Saturday's exercises, has been conducted with a consideration and politeness rarely seen in American politics. For this we are glad and take courage. It is noticeable that the public and private estimate of Mr. Cleveland is much higher than when he took the same oath of high trust eight years ago. Not only has he grown in intelligence and power but he has grown morally, as evinced not alone by the love and loyalty of his beautiful wife, but by the fearless attitude which he is assuming towards moral questions. It is said that his first query concerning any candidate for a public place is, "Does he drink?" While not personally a total abstainer, which we keenly regret, he is evidently discovering the value in commercial life of the man who does not drink, and proposes to apply that principle to politics. Even if his action is based on a purely business basis, it is a step in advance, for which we rejoice.

YOKE-FELLOWS.

BY ADALINE HOHF BEERY.

I used to worry at a new-set task,
Or large responsibility of life,
Fearing the load and I unequal; nights
I dreamed of weird solutions, or sublime
Finales; but my parting eye-lids flashed
The photograph of yestern harassment,
And slow, unrested, I arose to meet
The gray day-break, and slipped my work-gear on.
And so my time and toil went dragging; chafed
With present frets, and scarred from past missteps,
And fearful of to-morrow's outcome, least
I deemed me 'mong the stalwarts in the faith.

One songful morrow, when somehow the rose
And emerald of earth and sky half crazed
The larks, and me distraught a reverent space,
A light hand touched me; turning, at my side
I saw my Elder Brother yoked with me,
Straining with more than half the load. He smiled:
"'Tis not so heavy now, is it, my friend?"
How blind I was! such service to ignore!
My Lord my servant! Always more than friend,
He begs the larger share of all our woes,
Content if we but keep abreast with Him.
Greater commission I have since received;
But now I know that noblest images
Ourselves may rear, and find it sweet employ,
Through Him whose hand directs the chiseling.

DOCTOR CONSTANTINE'S WILL.

BY MARY E. IRELAND.

In a luxurious home in a western city John Constantine, an elderly physician, lay upon a bed of sickness. None knew better than he that before the dawning of another day he should be summoned to a better world.

On one side of Dr. Constantine's couch sat Marjorie Ainslie, a saintly woman in the garb of a deaconess of his own church, and upon the other side was his adopted niece, Ethel Constantine, weeping silently.

When Marjorie Ainslie left the hospital where she had been for three years training as a professional nurse, Dr. Constantine had been the first to recognize her ability, and in his capacity, as skilful and responsible physician, had recommended her to his patients, and from the beginning Marjorie was a success. His esteem for her was such that he had requested her to take charge of him should he need her services. She had promised, and had been at his bedside from his first attack, a fortnight before.

"Ethel," said the sick man feebly, "if sister Marjorie will excuse us, I would like to say a few words to you."

"I will be in the next room, Miss Ethel," said the nurse, rising quietly, "until you summon me to return."

"My darling child," said he, the moment they were alone, "it is only within the last hour that it has occurred to me that I should offer an explanation to you in regard to a clause in my last will, which was made immediately after the death of my wife, two months ago. I have left you sole heir to my estate upon one condition, and that is that you either remain unmarried, or unite yourself in marriage only with one who is a total abstainer from all intoxicating drinks. In case of your refusal to comply with these conditions the property is to revert to distant relations of my late wife, all whom I could claim as relatives having preceded me to the other shore. I have been thinking that you may consider it unkind in me to lay this restriction upon you, but with my dying breath I wish to impress it upon your mind that it is only my anguished longing to spare you the misery of being a drunkard's wife that prompts me to do so. Ethel, your father died in a fit of delirium tremens, and your mother —one of the loveliest women I ever knew, died from nervous prostration at witnessing the horrors which the demon of intemperance brings upon its victims. I have done everything in my power to help rid the land of this terrible, blighting curse, but thus far, have seen but little result from my efforts. I must, however, do all I can to protect you from such a fate as that suffered by your mother."

"Oh, uncle, you have distressed yourself to tell me this and there was no need;" said Ethel tearfully, "for, trained so carefully as I have been by you and dear Aunt Constantine, I had resolved never to unite myself with one who touches wine."

"Thank God for this victory," said Dr. Constantine, raising his eyes to heaven; "and promise me Ethel, to do all you can to prevent your young friends from making this terrible mistake of a life-time."

"I promise, uncle, and will do all I can in every way to help on the cause of temperance."

When the will of Dr. Constantine was read it was found that in addition to leaving his estate to Ethel, with conditions named, his life-long friend, Dr. Fordyce, was appointed executor of his will and guardian to Ethel. To her great satisfaction, he and Mrs. Fordyce were willing to live in the Constantine home, thus allowing the young girl to remain surrounded by the dear objects familiar from childhood.

As the adopted niece of the honored Dr. and Mrs. Constantine, Ethel had moved in the best society in the city. She was highly educated, winning in appearance and was loved for her noble mind and gentleness. The Constantines had always entertained handsomely, and as time passed the mansion resumed its share of social duty. Mrs. Fordyce was looking eagerly forward to the time when her son, by a former marriage, should finish his medical studies in Germany and make the fourth in the happy home circle, as a partner of Dr. Fordyce. Ethel took great interest in his return, for she remembered him as a handsome, bright youth, and his letters to his mother fostered her good opinion of him.

He came, and she found Ralph Hastings to be more than she expected; a healthy, handsome, happy-hearted young man. He was intelligent, honorable, conscientious, generous and amiable. He was welcomed cordially in society and about a year after his return Ethel became his promised wife, and to the great delight of his mother, the marriage was to take place the following autumn.

During the summer preceding, Mrs. Fordyce and Ethel became much concerned for the health of Dr. Hastings. After being up late at night, as they supposed with his patients, he would at breakfast appear moody or irritable and nervous, but as the day wore on he regained his usual calm and agreeable manner. His mother was convinced that he was applying himself too closely to his professional duties, and begged him to take a journey for change of scene and rest, but he smilingly assured her that he should do very well until the bridal journey in the autumn. Less than a week before the day appointed for the wedding Dr. Hastings was taken sick and was unable to leave his room. Although the invitations were all out, and preparations made for the grand entertainment, which would make the Constantine mansion long remembered, all thoughts of festivity were put aside in the anxiety of the moment. Sister Marjorie was sent for and was soon at the bedside of the invalid. In the still watches of the night she had a conversation with him.

"Dr. Hastings you are killing yourself with strong drink, and are now upon the verge of delirium tremens. Every time that I have been a few minutes from the room I smell liquor when I return. I suppose you drink only at night, and thus escape detection; but every one knows the conditions of Dr. Constantine's will, and should you recover and make Miss Ethel your wife she will lose her inheritance, and be dependent upon the weak will of an intemperate man for the necessaries of life. She must be told the true state of the case, for she and your mother have no other thought but that you have injured your brain by too close attention to your professional duties."

"And that is all I wish them to know," said he haughtily, "and I consider that you are stepping out of your position as nurse to presume to lecture me."

"It is in my capacity as nurse that I take it upon myself to warn you, and Miss Ethel must be told,"

"If you do not promise to keep it a secret from her you shall not leave this room alive," cried the excited man as he arose and tried to steady himself upon his feet.

"Lie down, this instant, before you fall and I have to summon assistance to help you back to bed," said Sister Marjorie sternly.

The poor inebriate sank again upon his couch and broke into maudlin tears, pleading with her not to tell Ethel, and promising to reform before the day arrived for the wedding. Sister Marjorie said no more, except to ask where he kept the liquor that she might remove the temptation from his reach, but he refused to tell her; she resolved to search for it could she succeed in doing so unobserved.

Toward daylight Mrs. Fordyce, pale and anxious, came in to take her place by the bedside that the nurse might have a few hours' rest, and Ralph told her of his intemperance and that the nurse had threatened to tell Ethel. Stunned at the disclosure, Mrs. Fordyce was for a time incapable of speech, almost of thought.

"Oh, Ralph," wailed she at length, wringing her hands in anguish, "how could you, my only child, bring such trouble and disgrace upon me, and break the heart of that sweet girl who so loves and trusts you. Oh, what a chance for happiness you have trampled under your feet, for she will never marry you."

"Don't cry, mother," said Ralph, his ready tears flowing. "Just you wait until I get over this spell and I will be a credit to you yet. I would have kept it from you for I thought it would worry you, but I wish you to command that meddlesome nurse to keep it a secret from Ethel; for if she hears it I shall lose her, and then I should not care what became of me. I shall reform and be all right before our wedding day; only keep it from Ethel."

In all Mrs. Fordyce's prosperous life she had never experienced such a shock as this, and years seemed to have been added to her age. When the breakfast bell rang she was forced to take her place at the head of the table where her ghastly face attracted instant attention.

"Oh, Mrs. Fordyce, I know Ralph is in danger, and you are keeping it from me," cried Ethel. "I must see for myself how he is," and she arose from the table.

"Wait, dear, sister Majorie has taken up some toast and tea to him; as soon as she comes down we will go to him."

The moment Ethel heard the nurse descend she hastened out to meet her and ask if it were a convenient time to visit the sick room.

"I suppose so, Miss Ethel, as good a time as any," replied the compassionate sister Marjorie hesitatingly.

Mrs. Fordyce joined her, and they went up to Ralph's apartments. Ethel's horror at the sight which met her eyes could scarcely have been greater. Ralph had risen the moment the nurse left the room, made his way to the dressing bureau, and was taking a drink from a flask. His eyes were red and heavy, his lips swollen and purple, his hair damp and disordered, and the sickening odor of the room told all.

"You brought her here to humiliate me, mother; you know you did," cried Ralph in drunken fury, and seizing a heavy cut-glass goblet, he hurled it at her with all his force.

Too wretched for tears, Ethel said as soon as they were out of the room, "Our engagement is broken; we must inform our friends that there will be no wedding here."

"Oh, Ethel," cried Mrs. Fordyce, sinking upon her knees by the couch, "do not be so cruel; you will drive him to despair, and he will go down to ruin if you forsake him. Can loss of riches be placed in the balance with the loss of a soul? If you marry him, your influence as a good wife will save him."

"If his love of me and his knowledge of my promise to Uncle Constantine has no effect upon him, my influence as a wife would not, nor would it be increased by my loss of property," replied Ethel, weeping. "No, the engagement is at an end; I will marry no man who is not a total abstainer."

Mrs. Fordyce saw that it was useless to say more. That day the wedding invitations were cancelled, the bridal dress put away, and Ethel, pale and careworn, went about her daily duties, making no allusion to the sad affair either at home or abroad.

Ralph, in the meantime, brought to his senses by Ethel's prompt refusal to marry him, not only made a solemn promise to his mother to never again touch a drop of ardent spirits, but a few weeks after his recovery he went to hear an eloquent temperance lecturer and signed the pledge of total abstinence.

It was a happy day for Mrs. Fordyce, and in her heart she thought that Ethel should reward him by bestowing her hand upon him; but no allusion was made to it by any member of the family.

Two years passed away and Dr. Ralph was keeping the pledge. His practice was large and lucrative, and in society he was more popular than ever, and nothing but urgent cases of illness prevented his presence in the house of God. Late in the winter there was a wonderful outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and Dr. Ralph was one of the subjects of the gracious influence. Then indeed did Ethel have faith in his reformation, for she knew him to be sincere, and gave him the promise that the week following the communion of which he was to partake for the first time, their wedding should take place. During the weeks which followed, Dr. Fordyce, who was one of the elders of the church, endeavored to influence the session to substitute unfermented wine in place of that which had always been used at communion services. His proposal had at first met with steady opposition, but by talking upon the subject every opportunity that offered, he had prevailed upon one of them to see the matter from his standpoint; but as there remained three in opposition, the fermented wine took its usual place upon the communion table.

At their meeting preparatory to the autumn communion, when Dr. Ralph and many other young men were to become members, Dr. Fordyce made strenuous efforts to win at least one of the three to his way of thinking, his hopes at last centering upon a timid, retiring little man who had as a rule gone where the others led.

"I hope, brother, that you have considered what I asked you at our last prayer-meeting and will use your influence to-day in substituting the pure fruit of the vine for the intoxicating wine at our communion to-morrow," said he, as they arrived a little in advance of the others.

"Yes, I have thought over what you said," replied the other hesitatingly, "but I really cannot see why we should change our time-honored custom. It seems to me wrong to do so."

"There is no time to go into a theological discussion," replied Dr. Fordyce, "but would you consider it wrong if you had a son who has a natural love of strong drink, and has allied himself to a temperance society as a protection from temptation?"

"Oh, I consider it fanatical if not sacreligious for one to suppose that a sip of communion wine could be looked upon as a temptation," replied his companion serenely.

"But brother, it is, perhaps, no temptation to you or to me or to many others, but we should have compassion upon the weak ones, remembering the injunction, 'that no man put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way.'"

"A person so weak as that would not be safe anywhere," remarked the other dryly, somewhat piqued at the anxious tone of the doctor, which he mistook for impatience.

"I believe that the use of fermented wine keeps many out of the church," persisted Dr. Fordyce. "Those who have pledged themselves to 'touch not, taste not, handle not' cannot conscientiously take our fermented communion wine."

"I agree with the others that it is better to make no change," replied his companion, as though weary of the conversation; "I am very conservative in my opinions."

Dr. Fordyce remained in the minority, awaiting the result with keen anxiety, and when the following Sabbath he saw the gleam which came into the eyes of Ralph as the fumes of the wine greeted him, he knew, with a sinking heart, that the demon of the wine cup had triumphed and was rejoicing over the broken pledge.

That night Dr. Ralph procured from a neighboring drug-store enough brandy to render him helpless, and none can fathom the anguish of Mrs. Fordyce and Ethel.

"Uncle Constantine left it optional with me. I shall never marry," said Ethel.

Three years brought many changes. Ethel Constantine had used part of her property in building an asylum for inebriates, Dr. Ralph Hastings being among the first of the many inmates. In the garb of a deaconess she is devoting her life to the helpless, the poor, the sick, the tempted, the fallen, and she measures her life by what she has escaped in the fate of a drunkard's wife, not by what she has lost in being an old maid.

HOW SHALL THE UNION COME?

BY ELIZA STOWE TWITCHELL.

Frances E. Willard, in her late speech at Denver, said: "The temperance army, the labor army and the union suffrage army must unite or die." Will you allow me, through your columns, to suggest a way—and it seems to me the only one—in which this union can be practically effected?

Herbert Spencer says: "A function to each organ, and each organ to its own function is the law of all organization. The lungs cannot digest, the heart cannot respire, or the stomach propel the blood;" and he argues from this that the artificial organ we call government must obey this natural law, and, as civilization advances, become more simple instead of more complex, and that in the future government must attempt only the work of protecting each man in his individual rights.

The individuals composing the temperance organization are as one in their thought and efforts to slay King Alcohol and rout his army of demoralizers. For this organization to begin at once, advocating woman suffrage, free trade, or free silver might cause dissensions among its members, for upon these questions there are strong differences of opinion.

But the temperance army has so broadened its work of late years, that it has grown to stand for something more than temperance reform. It now branches out in all directions, until its sympathies are as broad as suffering humanity itself. The labor army has also grown to mean something more than a question of higher wages; for higher wages mean more comforts in the home, more leisure for improvement, a higher standard of living, a slow but steady lifting of the lowest class up into the middle class and, as you cannot lift the lowest round of the ladder without lifting the whole, so it means a higher, happier and purer civilization. In this way, by a slow but steady growth, both organizations have come to touch each other in their work for humanity.

When the bright, earnest women of the W. C. T. U. will study political economy and understand such questions as tariff, laws of wages, of rent, of interest, as clearly as they now understand every phase of the temperance question, when they will, especially, give heed to the new political economy which has awakened a fresh interest and thrown new light upon these subjects, once so hard and obscure, and learn that questions of trade and of commerce, of money and production, are, when broadened, questions of morals, of justice and of liberty; when our women will do this, they will just as surely elevate and broaden the influence of women, and thus join the three armies, as that their cause is just and their devotion to duty unfaltering.

Take, for example, our work for the Loyal Legion, and see how it is touched, on all sides, by the question of wages. The wages of the average unskilled workman in this country is less than $400 a year, nearer $350. After a large part of this has been given for rent, there is not enough left to support a family in even the comforts of life, unless the children help to earn subsistence.

While we are teaching these children lessons of purity, correct care of their bodies, circumstances over which they have no control are forcing them into the mills, the mines or work-shops, where the moral atmosphere is often impure and where close confinment and insufficent food leave their bodies ill-developed. Or, the slow but steady growth of population is forcing their parents to live in tenement houses, so closely packed that seclusion, and often decency, is impossible.

Or, look at our work in social purity and see how closely it is touched by the question of wages.

Everyone who knows anything of life in our great cities, knows that often the only question that is asked in our large stores when a girl applies for a situation for unskilled labor is, "Do you live at home?" The employer does not expect to pay wages only sufficent to keep the girl in food and clothing, her rent must be given at home. And when she has no home the struggle for a pure life becomes a terrible one. There are said to be forty thousand women in the city of New York, whose labor is so poorly remunerated, that it is hardly possible to keep soul and body together without the humiliation of accepting charity, (and charity is not always at hand) or else resorting to a life of shame.

What shall we do? Shall we demand that these women be paid higher wages, and refuse to purchase our thread and ribbons of these stores until the owners will pay higher wages to their employés? We might as well expect to cause the Mississippi river to flow up hill by an act of legislature!

What we must do is to study this new political economy and learn the law that regulates wages. When there are ten workmen for one position wages will fall, but when there are ten employers hunting for one workman wages will rise, and to bring this about is by no means impossible.

There are districts in New York City where thousands of human beings are herded together like cattle, often so densely packed as to live thirteen in one small room, often a dark, unwholesome one at that. Work is so scarce and hands so plenty that it is impossible for them to obtain steady employment, and so they are crowded by advancing pressure of population to the very brink of the precipice of existence, eking out a wretched life on one meal a day and a hanging-shelf to sleep upon at night, while within a stone's throw of this locality live New York's millionaires, two hundred of them, whose united wealth amounts to over thirty billion, nearly one half the aggregate wealth of this country, according to President Harrison's last message to Congress, in which he states that our present wealth amounts to more than sixty-nine billion.

It is desirable that the American citizen and voter should be honest, thrifty, far-seeing, prudent, cultured, well-mannered, that intemperance and crime should lessen. All these are impossible while the workman cannot obtain steady employment, or is inadequately remunerated for his labor, and given no courage to hope.

Is it any wonder that crime is increasing, and that people are losing faith in God?

"Act as if God were, and you shall know that he is," is as true of a nation as of an individual. The new political economy claims to answer these questions. Why, amid advancing civilization, does poverty also advance? Why this seeming over population on the one hand, and vast tracts of lonely fields on the other? Why is it that those who create the larger share of this world's wealth, receive so little of it? These are questions that especially interest women, because they are moral questions, yes, religious questions. They must appeal to the heart of every white ribboner; woman's influence in these great movements is destined, more and more, to become an important factor.

Such an opportunity for good as the uniting of these three armies has seldom been presented. First, because the issues involved are as broad as suffering humanity itself; second, because here is an organization, extending world-wide, strong in all its parts, in which it is possible to awaken many of its members to a thorough knowledge and interest in these subjects.

Some of the unions are already alive to this. Last winter the union at Wollaston Heights, Mass., listened to a full course of lectures by one of its members upon such questions. Her talks embraced such topics as The Industrial Revolution, Wealth, Wages, Rent, Interest, Capital, Taxation, etc. Other neighboring unions during the coming winter, will listen to these topics, while vigorously carrying on their work for temperance.

"MORE father government in the home, more mother government in the church and state."

SYSTEMATIC METHODS IN REFORMS.

BY GRAHAM WALLIS.

(Concluded.)

A letter came from a Lancashire workman the other day. He wrote that he works so hard that he gets sleepy over it, and has found that he cannot carry out the system of self-education which he had planned. He asked my advice. Now I know that the best thing for him, and for all those men, is shorter hours, better wages, and I am working hard for that. It is the very best way in which I can help these serious-minded workmen up in Lancashire. What I wish to emphasize is the importance of doing good according to a plan, doing it to the mass and seeing in the mass the individual.

Now we wish to make a big and serious effort to raise London life to a better key, and there are two classes working at this vast problem. The first must be a class of trained experts. As I have mentioned, nurses in the hospitals for the poor cannot now be women who have been in some way roused up to a greater interest in their unfortunate fellows, and who are willing to go on and nurse men and women without knowing how. They would only do harm, by reason of their ignorance, so that the true way for the well-to-do who would help, is to make themselves skilled. A great deal of visiting in the workhouses, hospitals, etc., is done by kindly, well-meaning women, and also rescue work, but if those who undertake it have never thought about the situation, never studied the causes of the misery they see, they will in all probability be as ineffectual, as was no doubt the Lady Clara of a former period. We must know why it is that these people are here, and we must seek to do away with that "why." This is the dominant purpose of modern philanthropy.

While all cannot be skilled workers, those who are can be helped as to the extent and form that those activities should assume; but for this there must also be a training. For instance, the death rate in a certain quarter of the city is high. The vestry is ignorant and corrupt in that locality. What can you do? You can do this: First, there are hundreds of local papers published in London which none of us have ever seen, but they are full of those facts that we must know in order to have a true basis for our action. You must classify the illustrations of misery and crime of which those papers are full; you will find out who are the relief guardians, and you must know who is who, and facts alone will enable you to become master of the situation. I knew a skilled worker in this great field who did more than anybody else to help London, and he was a most voracious reader of these newspapers. He learned what was taking place, he classified what he learned by putting his clippings in scrap-books under various heads; he studied the Blue Books. Now you may look lugubrious because I mention them. The other night a friend of mine who had written a play in which he mentioned a Blue Book, had it brought forward and placed on a table, whereupon his British audience fairly hooted at the sight of it. There is nothing more hopelessly mysterious to the average mind than a Blue Book containing the results of a Parliamentary committee of investigation into abuses of one kind or another, but such a book is honey in the honeycomb to a skilled worker in philanthropy. What are you going to do if you have not facts by which you may verify the principles by which those facts are to be judged?

Just to illustrate again. I met the other day some ladies going about in a very undesirable district of London trying to get everybody to vote for a certain man for the school board. I know he was wholly opposed to the system of popular education, and I asked why they were electioneering for such a man, whereupon they smiled in unison and said in chorus, "Why the vicar told us to go round." They were Lady Claras Vere de Vere of a past period who had drifted into an age that has learned better manners. They "meant well" but they did not know. Again, a lady whom I met, and who was an excellent charitable worker, blamed the men in a certain part of the city because they would not work for ten cents an hour and praised the women because they said they were willing to work for no matter what. But the facts are that it is the courage of men not to take such low wages that has alone made organization possible and has wonderfully elevated the laboring classes; so that in a way those men were heroes, going hungry for a loaf of bread because they would not demoralize the labor market by working at such a scandalously low price.

Now if we are going to help those who need our help it is vital that the best and ablest men and women in the community should have an intelligent and decisive knowledge of the facts and principles that underlay philanthropy, for we do well to remember that just at present things are on an inclined plane. There is a wonderful stirring up of the substratum of society. Conservatives and Liberals are both somewhat alarmed and are ready to do something now. But they are not experts, their opinions are like seed planted in the sand; they are just as apt to try a foolish experiment with a cruel reaction as a successful experiment with a good hope of success. This is a dangerous situation and should be confronted by the courage and devotion of those who can see a hand's breadth ahead of their own faces in the study of the subject. If only one man or woman in one thousand would study just a little on these subjects I should be satisfied. I despair of getting any such proportion; but if I could hope from what I have tried to say that I might secure one added name I should feel richly rewarded. If we had one in thousand we should be safe from the uproar of strife and turmoil in this transition age.

Let people remember that they never had such a chance of study as now, never such a chance to do, to dare, to help, and to achieve. The great and beautiful field blossoms before them; it is as much more inviting than any other as the work of Christ was more inviting than that of any other who has lived, but we require men and women who can take initiatives, and that is at present a difficulty to find. To illustrate: I went to Norway a little while ago with a man who has a splendid talent for taking the initiative. We visited the schools and nothing escaped his keen and observant eye. We went into the school-house unexpectedly. We saw them working at sloyd. This man had his note-book out and sketched the desk where the master sat. He took a note concerning the tools, the number of children, what they were making —for initiative comes by readiness to perceive how a thing can best be done, and then it must collect the means by which that result can be achieved.

Then again if you have an idea pass it round. Do not keep it to yourself. I went to a poor-law school, asked what books they had, found that they had none that taught the children to observe nature. I went to the trustees and they said they would put such books as I suggested on the list, and have the children taught something of the out-door world. I was mentioning this to Sydney Webb, who is the greatest genius we have at present in the modern charity movement. He said to me, "Don't be content with having spoken to the trustees of a single school. There is a principle involved. Get your idea applied to all the schools. Tell it out in the papers, let all the people know." I felt reproved and recognized more clearly than before what is the secret of the ease, the skill and the economy of effort in the work of Sydney Webb. It is no good having suggestions and knowledge and not telling them to other people. The more you tell them the more you have helped the world, and that is what you have a tongue for.

Now a word about committe work. That is perhaps the place of greatest power, but the best committee work is done beforehand. I would rather have ten minutes before the committee sits than two hours afterwards. Fix your mind on what you mean to have done. Hold your purpose intently upon that. Work with individuals before they meet in their collective capacity. Be perfectly patient when you are sitting in the committee; no matter who loses his poise, keep yours, and play for your own hand. Have a purpose of your own, and then throw all your powers into the common stock. That is the true attitude for successful committee work and indeed for any real public achievement. Substitute purpose for impulse, put all your native power into the work, study to form the ordinary business habit of seeking out regular and effective methods, following along according to a plan, driving the nail in deeper with the hammer of each opportunity.

And now finally in order to carry out these helpful purposes for humanity, a few must speak to large audiences, and everybody must be able to speak ten minutes in the committee whenever it is required. Only a few in a million are great orators to whom the multitude will listen, but everybody can learn to speak acceptably to a group. I heard Mrs. Besant say that the way she began was by standing up at a desk, throwing her shoulders well back, breathing as naturally as she could, reading and afterwards repeating the best passages of orators who had succeeded in their work. Nobody can do this patiently for a few weeks or months without learning to speak. It is like learning to swim. After the first few strokes one will have overcome his fears and be ready to put out to sea, only he must not go beyond his depth. Ferdinand La Salle, the greatest socialist of history, is an example of the pains one man took in order to be a convincing speaker. He used to stand before a long mirror and rehearse, deciding what gestures to use and studying the expression of his face. Some people would laugh at that but it is justified by his success.

Women, as well as men, if they can do effective public work, owe it to the nation to invest some years of their lives in effort to help others, in which they should be associated with some large body of co-workers, and if they do this they must be able to make their ideas known through the wonderful medium of human speech. One answer is generally made to all this. "I don't like it." Well, I doubt if anybody does. It is an acquired taste, this taste for public speaking, at least I believe that to be true except in the greater instances; but remember that only through public work can the great mass be reached. Only the big public machine has money enough to reach them; the public bodies never beg as the smaller groups of philanthropists are obliged to do. On the contrary the public bodies send out the tax-list with the policeman at the back of it, and gather in the sinews of war with which they can carry on their enterprise. A lady who is a leader among the London churches was trying to combat some of the views I have here set forth, and said she believed more in individual effort. She told of two young men who, to her knowledge had adopted an old man and looked after him. But the trouble is, my friends, we have not enough young men to go round at that rate! Two young gentlemen to one old man is in fact a great waste of the raw material—one ought to be enough. I seriously think that what we ought to do is to get those two young men to train themselves to do more than take care of one old man. If they would combine with a few other men they could so change the situation of the old men in London as to add incalculably to the sum of human happiness and progress.

The harvest is so great, the laborers are so few, and the worst of it is the laborers go into the harvest with the rusty old sickle of the past. I confess it is less romantic to go into the harvest with the modern reaping machine, to get accustomed to its jostle and clang, to stoop down and lubricate its wheels to keep its belts and bolts in order; it is unromantic, but it accomplishes incalculably more, and we must be willing to look at this whole subject of our battle for the redemption of men as Von Moltke looked upon the battle-field. He was willing to give up his sword and his plume and sit down to his time-table. I have noticed that after a while people who work on the amateur method in a haphazard way are quite ready to quit. They will tell you how they took hold of a night school, worked there three nights a week teaching the boys to read John Gilpin, but they did not see much result and they gave it over after a little. On the contrary the man and woman who work in philanthropy according to a plan are not likely to quit. The mind loves order and system rather than chaos. It loves principles and facts. They are necessary to it, and it is not according to reason that a person should give up work which yields results. Amateur workers become hopeless and sink into apathy. I confess to you that such content as the minds of people show in the face of such awful misery as London manifests is the saddest thing I know in English life today.

Finally, we ought to approach our work with the idea of learning; to keep our mind always open, ready for the next thing, to be in a teachable spirit. The sight of a beggar on the street ought to suggest to us what causes combined to put him there, and then we should be ready, through organized, expert effort, to do away, according to our power, whether it be great or small, with this misery. Above all, let me plead for the patience that is willing to become skilled through frequent repetition of the same set of thoughts and actions; that love of humanity that will send us to our work with an open hand and a smiling face, that shall make the world a happier place for all whom we may meet.

COLUMBIAN CRUMBS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

UNIQUE USES OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The foreign visitor who supposed the sole province of corn was to make pork and beef will have his views broadened, whether or not his artistic sense be quickened, upon entering the Iowa state building. The magnificent dome of the main hall is hung with corn of every color from the fiery red blaze, delight of Hiawatha's dusky maidens, to the pale, "white dent." Grains and grasses cover the columns, and form a beautiful frieze, but the figures in corn husks are unfortunate and had better have been left out.

One of the largest and most desirable grants of space in the Agricultural Building has been made to Missouri. and prominent artists in that state are busy with designs for filling it in a creditable way. There will be one hundred and thirty-four varieties of wheat and one hundred varieties of grasses in the exhibit, says the St. Louis Republic. A corn palace enters into the plan, in which will figure stalk, shuck, silk, ear, shelled corn and cob. A pagoda in the center will cover a miniature lake, stocked with fish, and support a shaft of grain surmounted with a globe, upon which the state of Missouri is conspicuous. Other groupings of grain take the shape of a life-size, equestrian figure of General Washington. The Eads bridge, of which St. Louis is justly proud, is worked out in cane and other products of the rich bottom lands of Missouri.

The ladies of Arcola, Ill., have been handling broom-corn in an unusual way, weaving it into a large portiére to hang in the state building. Pith, stalk and brush enter into this work of art, produced in the greatest broom-corn region of the earth.

BONBONS.

The fond faith of every woman, that every man born south of that political equator, "Mason and Dixon's line," is a knight, has been bravely "evidenced" in the manner in which the secretary of the national commission, Colonel Dickinson, a southern man, has measured gallantly up to the standard and informed the members of the House that he had watched this Exposition grow from its embryonic state to its present advanced condition, being familiar with every phase of its evolution. "To me the wonderful and significant thing about it is the part taken by the ladies. No one outside can appreciate the tremendous good that Mrs. Potter Palmer and her colleagues have accomplished. It is the crowning achievement of the sex in this growing nineteenth century. From the World's Fair we date a new epoch in the history of womankind, and posterity will know that American women have created a new and loftier status by their patriotic and intelligent labors for the Exposition." Words could hardly be found to express higher appreciation.

Sweets of another sort will be on exhibition and sale in the chocolate pavilion, modeled after the famous Roman Temple of Vesta. It is one of the most beautiful buildings on the ground; though small, being only fifty-four feet in diameter—its form a perfect circle. Twenty circling pillars lift the dome to a height of fifty-seven feet. Tiles of many hues give this dome the appearance of having coaxed a rainbow to settle upon it, while the broad frieze, girdling the building with scroll-work in colored glass, furnishes setting for eight opalescent windows that are like gems in a coronet. A Boston firm pays the cost of building this exquisite structure for the privilege of selling its "caramels" inside. There will be a delightful reception room for ladies on the second floor.

THE DISTILLERY RULED OUT.

It was rumored that a model distillery would be set up under cover of the agricultural department. Collector of Internal Revenue McMer's attention being called to it, he pronounced the scheme illegal, saying, "We have no authority for making such a grant, and if a still were put up in Jackson Park without our consent, it would be confiscated by the government, and the directors would be made defendants in the preceedings that would be instituted against the person who sought to evade the law." The extremes of the liquor business—the still and the sot —are not to be permitted inside the sacred precincts of the Columbian Exposition.

IN BUTTER.

The Indiana board of lady managers has commissioned Mrs. Caroline Brooks, of Flushing, L. I., to model a heroic statue in butter of one of the goddesses of mythology. Now an order should be placed for an ice-box of corresponding proportions. The heaviest producer of the raw material—the clay for artists in butter—is Lily Flag, flower of the Jersey herd now stabled in Jackson Park. Her output in one year was 1,047 pounds. Little Goldie is close behind, having produced thirty-four pounds in seven days, though not achieving quite as much during the year as her rival.

DUST.

Illinois school children have contributed one thousand dollars to be used in buying books for the Children's Building.

The state board of Rhode Island has given two hundred dollars to the Children's Building.

Fraulein Wely, chairman of the section for women writers, has collected over three hundred volumes, representing the best work of famous women authors of Germany. These are ready for shipment.

The fine arts section of the German women's collection for the Woman's Building contains some rare portraits. Among them is one of Angelika Kauffmann.

Spanish women will make an exhibit in the Woman's Building, the Queen Regent being president of the women's committee. She will be represented here by the Infanta Eulalie, who comes in company with her husband, Prince Antoine.

The first locomotive to be installed in the Transportation Building was "Pioneer," also the first locomotive that ever entered Chicago. It is a crude specimen of the genus Iron-horse, but fired up and went into the grounds by its own steam.

Permission has been given Miss Laura Hayes to sell reproductions of the last nail driven in the Woman's Building.

Chicago, Ill.

"WOULD that the seven millions of young men of the republic were as much attuned in heart to the great work of their mothers and sisters as is this young man. In answer to his naïve question, 'Has a Men's Christian Temperance Union ever been formed?' it occurred to one to send these words: 'Yes, my boy, the Prohibition party.' We are circulating the petition at the ballot-box, and taking the census there of those great hearts dedicated to God and Home and Native Land."

WASHINGTON NOTES.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District of Columbia has presented the following petition to the Senate:

Believing that the liquors served in the incorporated clubs of this city are debauching and ruining hundreds of our young men, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District of Columbia prayerfully petitions your honorable body to make no exceptions in the liquor license bill of the District favoring said clubs.

The license bill for the District which has recently passed the House and is now before the Senate, provides: "That any duly incorporated club having a license under this act may sell intoxicating liquors to its members at any time till one o'clock a. m.; provided further, however, that any licensed dealer may, with the permission of the excise board, at any bona fide entertainment of any society, club or corporation, sell intoxicating liquors between such hours as the board aforesaid may designate in said permit.

The petition is signed by Mrs. S. D. La Fetra, president, and Mrs. Emma F. Shulton, recording secretary. The Washington Post of recent date contains an editorial, criticising this action of the union. The editor says:

We make bold to state for the information of the ladies generally that there are clubs and clubs in this district as well as outside of it. It is notorious, of course, that many so-called clubs exist here which were organized for the express purpose of evading the liquor law and the regulations as to Sunday. Their only purpose is to facilitate drinking and gambling. They offer no social or intellectual advantages to their members. Those who join them pay a merely nominal fee—say one dollar for both initiation and annual dues—and the very nature of the surroundings and the equipment amounts to a confession that they are there to game and drink, and for no other possible purpose. That such establishments as these should be exempted from police regulation and surveillance is not to be thought of. They need such surveillance more urgently than the lowest grog-shops in the city. So far the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is distinctly right.

But the petition is sweeping, and therefore misguided. There are other clubs. Such organizations as the Army and Navy, the Metropolitan, the University, the Columbia Athletic and the National Capital Press clubs are as different in all essential respects from those we have previously mentioned as day is from night or good breeding from rowdyism. These are legitimate establishments. They are not conducted for licentious purposes any more than the average citizen's home is.

Notwithstanding the Post's opinion the good women of the union intend to continue their fight against Congress favoring clubs, and mass-meetings will be arranged for at which this subject will be most thoroughly discussed.

On Sunday evening, February 19, an interesting temperance meeting was held at the Metropolitan Methodist church to protest against the infamous license bill for the District that has just passed the House and is now before the Senate. The strong denunciations of the speakers were warmly applauded by the large audience, and resolutions were adopted condemning especially the clause which relieves saloon-keepers from the necessity of obtaining every year the consent of a majority of the real estate owners and householders upon both sides of the block before the license can be issued by the district commissioners. The bill was denounced as a measure prepared by the liquor dealers and for the liquor dealers.

The Rev. Dr. Corey presided, and explained that the purpose of the meeting was to oppose an inhuman effort to pass a most iniquitous measure. Representative Morse, of Massachusetts, made the first address, in which he denounced the license system, as he also had done in the House when this bill was under discussion. He said: "As for the argument used by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Hemphill) that this measure will produce income to the government of the District, there would, it seems to me, be about as much statesmanship and as much sense in a proposition to inoculate men with the smallpox and then to lay a tax on coffins in order to raise a revenue, as to undertake to collect revenue by licensing men in this District to carry on the business of making beggars, paupers, lunatics, suicides and murderers. I utterly repudiate any such methods of raising revenue."

Representative Pickler, of South Dakota, spoke next, proclaiming himself essentially and eternally against the saloons. He drew a picture of the fresh and vigorous west, with the vote of women reforming the effete cities of the east. He said he had not voted for the District license bill; he believed in making the traffic obnoxious and wiping it out. He had succeeded in tacking on an amendment by which two citizens could compel the district attorney to prosecute law-breakers by their sworn complaint. He had also proposed to close the saloons on March 4, for in his opinion there was no consistency in making an appropriation of $5,000 to keep order, at the same time throwing open the saloons to create disorder.

Mr. Pickler declared, as he had before done in the House, that "if wine is taken into that pension office to sell or give away it will be an infamous disgrace to the nation." He closed his admirable address by saying that if the church people were in dead earnest in the matter they could close all the saloons before the first of May.

Mr. F. M. Bradley followed with a very practical speech. The Rev. Dr. Corey closed the discussion. He said that he considered the liquor interest the most marvelous, organized despotism in existence, and that there had not been a republican form of government in any city of over fifty thousand inhabitants for ten years. The saloons ruled them. The liquor dealers employed a skilful attorney to write a bill and take it up to Congress. Then the committee sent an invitation to the liquor dealers to come and discuss it.

When this license bill for the district was under discussion in the House, Mr. Pickler, Mr. Morse, Mr. Dingley, of Maine, and Mr. Joseph D. Taylor, of Ohio, attempted to secure amendments that would be favorable to the temperance interests. Mr. Dingley called attention to the fact that the highest penalty which may be inflicted under this law for the first violation is no more than the license fees. He thought that the penalty for selling without license ought to be greater than the license fee.

Representative Long moved to strike out the following language, which appeared in the section of the bill prohibiting the sale of liquor after twelve o'clock. "Provided: That the keeper of any hotel or tavern having a license under this act may sell intoxicating liquors to bona fide registered guests in his hotel or tavern at the meals or in the rooms of such guests; and provided further: That any duly incorporated club having a license under this act may sell intoxicating liquor to its members at any time till the hour of one o'clock a. m.; provided further however: That any licensed dealer may, with the permission of the excise board, at any bona fide entertainment of any society, club, or corporation, sell intoxicating liquors between such hours as the board aforesaid may designate in said permit."

Mr. Long's amendment was lost, only six voted for it while fifty-six voted against it.

Representative Taylor succeeded in getting an amendment passed which prevents the repeal of the prohibition law for the one-mile limit of the Soldiers' Home.

We are thankful that we have a few members in Congress who consider the temperance interests of the country. But unfortunately so very few they are unable to accomplish much of importance. God speed the day when the majority of our national law-makers may be Prohibitionists.

The Sunday liquor-law, under which prosecutions for the sale of liquor in the county of Washington have been made since 1867, has been declared null by Judge Kimball.

The question came up in the form of a test case. Frederick Rose, the keeper of a wine house on the Glenwood road, was charged, under the old levy court act of 1867, with violation of a general Sabbath law, in selling intoxicants. The validity of the ordinance of the levy court was questioned on the ground that the act of Congress of 1865, authorizing the levy court to prevent the breaking of the Sabbath did not authorize that court to pass ordinances preventing the commission of any act except those specifically enumerated, or which were of the same character as those so enumerated. That act of Congress merely directed the levy court to pass ordinances for the prevention of the breach of the Sabbath by hunting, gaming, fishing or otherwise. It was contended by the district attorney that the word "otherwise" was broad enough to authorize the levy court to pass ordinances preventing the commission of any act which would constitute a breach of the Sabbath.

Judge Kimball took the matter under a week's consideration, and rendered the decision that the word "otherwise" in the act, refers to acts in the same category as those of hunting, gaming, fishing, and is not general in its effect. The prisoner is therefore discharged. This decision renders null all liquor prosecutions in the county. Rose's place is within the one-mile limit, and it seems he now can sell liquor on Sunday.

Certainly the District of Columbia is in great need of better Sunday laws. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District continues to prosecute its good work along various lines under the worthy president, Mrs. S. D. La Fetra. There have been two new branches of the union organized this winter, one at Brookland, a beautiful suburb of Washington. Mrs. R. R. West, wife of the pastor of the Brookland Baptist church, has been elected president. Another branch society was organized in the Gurley Presbyterian church of Washington, of which Mrs. Mary E. Foxwell was elected president.

The Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union here seems to have received new life and inspiration this year. The young ladies have had some delightful receptions at headquarters on H street. Interesting programs have been rendered at these receptions, and a number of young men have been induced to sign the pledge.

The Calvary Baptist church Y has opened a coffee-house at the end of one of the leading street-car lines to serve coffee to the drivers.

Dr. Mary Wood Allen gave several lectures in Washington this winter which were well attended. The Continental temperance cadets of the Ninth Street Christian church will give an entertainment in the near future which promises much instruction as well as pleasure, Mrs. N. H. Bradley having been for some time very busy drilling the young people. IDA HINMAN.

SOUTH DAKOTA AGAINST RE-SUBMISSION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—South Dakota has won a great victory in the legislature this winter. Numerous bills for re-submission have been presented and the first week of February the house temperance committee reported in favor of a township local option substitute. Intense excitement prevailed. A minority report, signed by three members, for indefinite postponement was presented, and on motion the minority report was substituted for the majority report and adopted by a vote of forty-three to thirty-nine.

The temperance people of the state are jubilant. The state W. C. T. U. has been represented at the capital by Mrs. Anna R. Simmons, vice-president at large, and by the writer.

A number of temperance meetings have been held during the session. Mrs. Simmons gave an able address in the Hall of Representatives on Sunday evening, January 29. Nothing caused the enemy greater anxiety. Hearts were touched, votes were made for the home and a collection of thirty-five dollars was taken at the close for state work.

The enemy is still active, hoping to yet bring about some legislation favorable to the saloon, but we believe right will prevail. Dakota has never yet failed to stand by the home. "Under God the people rule."

WORK OF OUR RAILROAD EVANGELIST.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—My heart has been made to rejoice by the receipt of a letter from our dear sister, Jennie Smith, the railroad evangelist, working under the auspices of the W. C. T. U.

For the past few months our sister has been devoting her time and labors mainly among the railroad men, firemen and policemen in Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas and other frontier states. In defiance of the storms that have so generally prevailed, this indefatigable Christian worker has, in the face of blizzards and snow storms, continued her work, and held on an average two meetings every day since she left her mountain home in Maryland in September.

Many of these meetings were held in round-houses, firemen's halls and police headquarters, places where the "gospel" was for the first time proclaimed. Jennie Smith writes me that the spirit of the Lord has been manifested in a remarkable degree in her meetings, and that nearly three hundred have been hopefully converted. Among this number were drunkards and gamblers, snatched as "brands from the burning" and by Divine grace made new "creatures in Christ Jesus." Instances are given of some of these reformed men now devoting their time exclusively among their former associates, leading them to give up the service of Satan, and take Christ as their leader.

The superintendent of the Santa Fe shops at Argentine on one occasion gave his men an extra half-hour at noon in order that they might come to Jennie's meeting. Over one hundred attended, and some of these were led to Christ.

One man was asked by a young convert to attend a railroad meeting. His reply was, "No! I am too deeply steeped in sin," but the reformed man would not give up his associate, and insisted on his coming to Jennie's meeting. He went and was converted. At a subsequent meeting this man rose (when asked to tell his experience) and with tears streaming down his face said: "Boys, I've done about everything a wicked man could do; I've squandered my money for rum and neglected my wife and children. I've been railroading thirty-five years and during all that time I've been drinking. Last Sunday as I was going up Union avenue, stopping on the way at almost every saloon, one of my reformed friends met me and asked me to go with him to Jennie Smith's meeting at the hall. I was just about full enough to be ready to go anywhere I was asked, and so I went with 'Bob' to the meeting. I was attracted by the singing and interested in the earnest way Miss Jennie presented the truth; it touched my heart; it was the first meeting I had attended in twenty-nine years; my mind was carried back to my boyhood; I recalled the time when my mother gave me this Bible (holding up one) and when she uttered her last prayer for me, and as she bade me 'good-by' laid her hand upon my head and made me promise to be a good boy; it seems to me that I can even now feel the presence of that sainted mother, long since in Heaven. I am too full to say more to-night, but before I sit down I want to tell you that God has for Christ's sake forgiven my sins. I have signed the pledge, and am resolved, God helping me, that henceforth I will live a Christian life. And now I tell you, boys, that if I had all the wealth there is in Kansas City, I would not exchange it for my interest in the Lord Jesus Christ."

The above items I have gleaned from various editorial notices, contained in papers published in places where Miss Jennie has held her meetings. In conclusion let me add, that while our sister has given special attention to work among "railroad men" and laboring classes, she has not entirely neglected others. She has also distributed over three thousand "white buttons" bearing the insignia R. R. T. A. to men who have joined the "Railroad Temperance Association." These buttons are paid for by one of the governors of a western state, who has given two thousand dollars for that object. They are given only to reformed drinkers. H. H. SMITH.

A HEART REFRAIN.

BY MRS. C. D. H. THOMPSON.

How can we mourn?
How dare we wear and fret so sore,
When those we love touch other shore,
And weep forlorn—
How can we mourn?

If we could know
The loves they've gained up there, our love
So true would bid us rise above
Such bitter woe—
If we could know.

If we could hear
The songs they sing, our own sad heart
Would catch the strain, and lose the smart
Of sob and tear—
If we could hear.

If we could know
Their joy in hopes at last fulfilled,
And peace that comes from heart-aches stilled,
We'd fret not so—
If we could know.

And if we knew
To go away meant sweet release
From cross and care, meant joy and peace—
How should we do—
If we but knew?

FRED'S ESCAPE.

A Story for Young Mothers.

BY M. L. SHEERMAN.

Mrs. Lawson is a loving wife, a true mother and a warm-hearted friend. A motherless girl, she grew up where dancing and card playing were the only pleasures she shared with people who did not consider wine or beer "drink."

She frequently saw the guests of her guardian foolishly "funny." By their standard no one was drunk who could walk or talk straight. She did not choose her surroundings. What child does? To her violence was the only sure indication of reprehensible drunkenness. By her standard she was a temperance woman. Her husband, a man of large brain and warm heart held similar ideas.

Fred, the son, was a handsome boy of good temper and more than ordinary ability. They boarded at a good house in a pleasant part of Chicago. Mrs. Lawson had many friends among the boarders, because in the most unconventional way she made the parlor cheerful with dancing and card playing—in which all could participate—her husband being always present, and her son at her side.

The young gentlemen in the parlor frequently supplied beer or wine to the entertainment, and Fred commonly regretted to go to bed when they all seemed to feel the best and said the funniest things. Fred's aunt sometimes came into the parlor but never said much. Fred knew with some dislike that she was a Prohibitionist, yet was fond of her when she helped him in lessons and read "Uncle Remus," with his cute advice to boys. The card-playing increased until it ran into Sunday. Fred enjoyed the funny things the young men said when he came in from Sunday-school; he felt as if he had missed a great deal in going to church.

One Sunday some visitors came to spend the afternoon. When Aunt Louise returned from church she was surprised to see both cards and wine on the table.

"Why, Aunt Louise, you do not call wine 'drink,' do you?"

"It is for me," said Miss Louise, who went directly to her room where she sat thinking about it until she heard a noise of scuffling. She stepped to her door and saw in the lower hall a tall, strong man with his coat off, raging as only an insanely drunken man can. Others were standing near; they said:

"Do not go down. The way he is now he will shoot a woman as quick as a man. Listen!"

The madman called to Mrs. Lawson to open the door. He threw his weight against it until the hinges creaked; he shouted, "I will give you until I count three. One—two—three." There was a crash, a flash and silence.

Miss Louise went down to her niece's door, rapped and entered, to find two or three excited men and as many frightened women. Mrs. Lawson had Fred in her arms. Three feet from the floor in the door-panel was a bullet-hole; through the center of Fred's pillow was another, and a pale girl showed the spent bullet that had lodged in her sleeve.

Then came broken explanations to which Miss Louise added some remarks on prohibition; several gave hearty assent, the first she had heard from that company. The visitors had kept Mrs. Lawson out of the house parlor. The young men there had found it dull and had gone to a billiard parlor for a "quiet game." Mr. Hand and his roommate, "Rod," with "a friend," came in about eleven o'clock. Mr. Rod's report was that "Hand went to drinking whisky 'straight.'" He said this so severely that all understood that he never did that, however much wine or beer he took crooked. Mr. Rod had been with Mr. Hand all the time; knew how many he had treated and how much money he had spent; but here the "friend" was obliged to take up the story. In their room Mr. Hand demanded that Rod should give up something in his pocket. Rod, who was much confused, did not comply. Mr. Hand sprang upon him—"in fun"—and fairly thrashed the floor with his small friend, pounding his face so fiercely and so swiftly that there was no chance for self-defense.

The "friend" ran to Mr. Lawson for help. He came up quickly, took Mr. Rod from Mr. Hand and went back to his room, having received several hard blows himself.

A policeman was summoned. He came very reluctantly and went away growling. He had interviewed Mr. Hand at the door of his room, pistol in hand, but had been assured to his satisfaction that everything was quiet. Each had told his story and the company was about to disperse when a second report rang through the house. Mr. Hand was again stamping from room to room, calling out the names of the nice young men with whom he had spent so much time at "quiet games" and "harmless drinks."

Mr. Lawson raised the street window. Fred cried out, "Papa must not leave us," but his father had already flung himself out on the ledge of the second story; he hung from the door capping, dropped to the outer stair, and was gone, to return in time with two officers and a neighbor.

The officers were enveloped in incredulity and abounded in judicial reproofs to the women for getting "excited." They could not see the bullet-hole until Miss Louise put her finger into it. At last when the perforated pillow, torn mattress and the bullet itself were exhibited, and they had coldly stared at Mrs. Lawson holding the quivering Fred, they declared that they could not go up to arrest the men unless some of these should go to his room with them, and then to the station and prefer charges. All these demands were finally satisfied. Mr. Hand came down stairs with his pistol in his hand, quite offended that Mr. Lawson (whom he had tried to shoot for rescuing his friend) had not waited to walk down with them.

Why describe the farce of justice? Mr. Hand "passed a twenty" into the hands of the officers that night; he came back next morning, bringing his revolver, and undertook to make genial apologies to all. Every one conceded that he would not have done so if he had been himself. But Mr. Lawson would not receive these apologies, and said he or Mr. Hand would change houses; so Mr. Hand left, and the course of life went on just as it had before—wine, beer, cards.

Aunt Louise tried to show that Mr. Hand did no more than the others; that difference of temperament and greater generosity in treating had made him more dangerous, but those who were most like him resented this comparison. "A man who knows that he has such a temperament has no business to drink," was the answer of even Mrs. Lawson, though she added: "Now, Freddie, mamma knows that since you have had such a narrow escape you will never, never drink," yet she sips wine and beer in his presence.

The mass of self-styled temperance people who sit in condemnation against prohibition are all represented in this true story. None of these people are of the lower class; they are intelligent, respectable and refined, but they do not believe in "extremes." We may not run from them, nor bestow epithets. We must live with, bear with, and pray for these who hinder us, help the enemy and destroy themselves.

Mrs. Lawson often speaks of Fred's "escape." Aunt Louise secretly sighs, and questions if he has escaped.

BIBLE CLASS LESSON.

BY SARAH B. COOPER.

[A very large Bible class assembles every week in the First Congregational church of San Francisco, to listen to Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper's exposition of the lesson of the day. This class is composed of intelligent men and women of all denominations. One secret of the great interest in this notable Bible class is the freedom of discussion. Mrs. Cooper believes in the Socratic method of teaching, and all sorts of questions are propounded, which the teacher answers with wonderful clearness, tact and skill. —EDS.]

A recent lesson was on the Rebuilding of the Wall of Jerusalem, Nehemiah 4. Those who engage in any good work, must expect discouragements. It is from united effort, diligence and persistency that success is won. Earnestness and enthusiasm are two great factors in any successful life. The builders of the wall worked with a trowel in one hand and a sword in the other. Christ said: "I am not come to send peace on the earth, but a sword." Wherever there are great evils to overcome, the sword must first do its work. First pure, then peaceable. Enemies occasion great loss of power and expenditure of resources, but they challenge the greatest heroisms on the part of those who stand for the right.

Why is it that great causes for the glory of God and the good of man must go through such conflict? Conflict is the law of life. It is the oak in open field, with elements in full force upon it, that is fitted for the foundation of a great ship. The heroes of earth must stand in open field. They must work with weapons of offence and defence. For successful battle veterans are needed, not raw recruits.

Nehemiah's prayers were not answered according to his requests. Our own prayers often seem to go unheeded, but no true prayer ever failed of its response. The end of all true prayer is to bring the soul into an attitude of perfect submission: "Not as I will, but as thou wilt." Only let the soul get hold of the great regnant fact, that God has a plan for humanity, that the heavens are not passionless, that there is a Great Beating Heart of Love ever near us, and we can suffer and wait.

The great fact of this universe is the personality of God. Let the heart once get tight hold of the fact of God's never-failing love and care; of His unflagging tenderness; of His eternal wisdom and guidance, and the sou can cry out even in the midst of bitter tears and anguish, "Though he slay me yet will I trust in him." The first and most obvious use of sorrow is to remind of God. When the deeps of the nature are stirred, the cry of the soul is religious—it turns for help to the Rock that is higher than itself.

No great enterprise has ever succeeded without self-sacrifice and enthusiasm; for instance, the great temperance work, which has come up out of much tribulation, and is going onward to victory. Whoever would lead a great reform must allow for the weakness of human nature. Nehemiah put the greatest strength at the weakest points. This was wise. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link.

The closing portion of the lesson was full of beauty and suggestion. In all the great campaigns and movements of earth, the real struggle is between certain moral and spiritual forces. We hear of bayonets that think. But the bayonets that both think and pray are invincible. The true substance of any army is the spirit that pervades it. The substance of a nation is its spiritual substance. It is to be noted that Nehemiah counselled them to work as well as to pray. The two are forever inseparably connected. "We labored in the work," says the prophet—not "we debated and argued and discussed," —but "we labored in the work." They had an objective point. There was a personal consecration to a great end. There are some who always see lions in the way. But a heroic leader who says "Come!" can rally even the faint-hearted. All successful leaders say, "Come," they never say, "Go ahead." See what one enthusiastic, inspired and persistent leader may accomplish. One, with God, is a majority.

FOR MOTHERS.

The following are some resolutions made by an earnest Christian mother. Would that every mother in the land would copy them, and read and think of them every day:

Resolved, That the first duty of the day performed by me shall be prayer to God, especially for strength and wisdom to properly instruct, guide and govern my child.

Resolved, That I will never permit my child to wilfully disobey me, or treat me with disrespect.

Resolved, That I will earnestly strive never to act from an impulse of passion or resentment, but will endeavor to preserve my judgment cool and my feelings calm, that I may clearly see and truly perform my duty to my child.

Resolved, That I will devote a certain portion of my time each day to self-instruction, in order to be able to properly instruct my child.

Resolved, That I will watch over my own temper at all times, cultivate a habit of cheerfulness, and interest myself in the little matters of my child, that I may thereby gain his love.

Resolved, That I will devote my time especially to those pursuits which will increase the comfort and happiness of my home and forward the best interests of my child.

Resolved, That I will study the health of my child, reading on the subject and asking the advice of those who are more experienced than myself.

Resolved, That I will not yield to discouragements from failure, but will persevere, putting faith in the promise of God to all those who earnestly and faithfully strive to do their duty.—Selected.

LOVE ONE ANOTHER.

Children, do you love each other?
Are you ever kind and true?
Do you always do to others
As you'd have them do to you?
Are you gentle to each other?
Are you careful, day by day,
Not to give offence by actions,
Nor by anything you say?

Little children, love each other—
Never give another pain;
If your brother speak in anger,
Answer not in wrath again.
Be not selfish to each other;
Never spoil another's rest;
Strive to make each other happy,
And you will yourselves be blest.

HOW THEY DID IT.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

"Marion Burt?"

"Present!"

"Annie Chester?"

"Present!"

"Horton Durham?"

"Present!"

And so on down the list until every name in the Creston L. T. L. had been called. A goodly company it was, made up of bright-faced children, who were glad to leave marbles and skipping-ropes for awhile to talk about their share in the great temperance work.

"What were we to talk about to-day?" asked their leader, Miss Edgeworth.

"About 'what next?'" answered a chorus of voices.

"Right. And how many have been thinking hard what we can do next to help drive King Alcohol away from the world?"

Up went twenty eager hands.

"Well, Annie, what do you think?" Annie was afraid of her own voice sometimes, and she answered timidly, "We might get more pledges signed."

"Yes, but we try to do that all the time. That is one part of our work we never mean to stop. Who can suggest something else?"

"We've done everything!" wailed one little lad, who was very fond of new undertakings, but very apt to get tired of things after a trial or two.

"Oh, no, not everything, Tommie; just a very few things. Now, I have an idea. Shall I tell it?"

"Yes! Yes!"

"Well, then how many know what the World's W. C. T. U. is?"

"Isn't it all the W. C. T. U's put together?" asked Tommie, who had brightened up now that something new was afoot.

"Yes, you are quite right, Tommie. And how many have heard about Self-denial Week?"

Only one hand was up this time.

"Tell us about it, Ellie."

"It's a week when all the W. C. T. U. people are going to get along without something and save the money."

"That is it. Everyone who loves the work the white ribbon stands for is asked to deny herself something during that one week, that the money saved in this way may go to help our dear cause. And I thought we might help. I am sure they will be glad to let the children in."

"We can help heaps," exclaimed Horton.

Then they talked it all over together. There was yet one week before Self-denial Week, and they would have plenty of time to think.

"Can't we begin now?" asked Tommy, but Miss Edgeworth thought it would be a good lesson in self-denial and patience for the boy to learn to wait well.

"I'd rather earn mine," said Marion Burt, who had very nimble fingers, which, though they were small, could fashion many a dainty bit of fancy work. "But the money must be saved by self-denial," and Miss Edgeworth explained what that meant. Their society only met once in two weeks, and at the next meeting they were to bring the money they had that their leader might send it to the National W. C. T. U. treasurer.

Twenty such earnest little people were surely never seen anywhere before, as this twenty in Creston, who were going to help the World's W. C. T. U.

On the day that ended Self-denial week the Legion met, and five times twenty rosy fingers and thumbs were tightly clasped over the precious money. They were to give it to Miss Edgeworth, and no one else was to know how much or how little each one had contributed.

But each one might tell how they had denied themselves. After the singing and a prayer in which Miss Edgeworth asked the Heavenly Father to bless the offering brought that day, the talking began.

"Annie, we will begin with you. How did you save your money?"

"I was going to buy a new skipping rope and a nice ball—"

"But you made the old ones do? Brave girlie! And you have had as much fun as ever?"

"Yes, ma'am," and the bright face she wore proved her words.

"Marion, what have you to tell us?"

"I don't know just what I went without; candy and things. I saved the money papa gives me to do what I like with. I never saved any before, but I brought it all."

"Was it hard work to keep it?"

Marion nodded. "Yes, hard."

"But you are glad now?"

"Oh, yes. Guess I'll do it again, sometime."

"Well, Tommie, you have a story, I am sure. Out with it!"

"I couldn't save any 'cause there wasn't any chance to." (Tommie's home was a very poor one where they never had any more, and often not as much, as they needed.) "But I got a job at running errands and brought the money."

"Another brave soldier. I knew my boys and girls would find out how to deny themselves. Ellie, have you something to tell us? No? Not now? Well, never mind. Ellie has brought some money, and we know she did her best—Ellie always does. Horton, we will listen to you."

Horton's eyes were shining but his face was very red as he told his little story: "Sister said if I'd eat more bread and not so much pie and cake and candy, she'd give me some money—and I didn't eat any—only—twice."

"You did well, my boy, and another time you will do better."

Each one had a different story and all were interesting. At the close of them, Annie Chester asked, "May we send some of our money somewhere else?"

"Where do you want to send it, dear?" asked Miss Edgeworth.

"To Miss Gordon, for the Willard fountain."

"Suppose you tell us about it. Perhaps some of us do not know of it."

So Annie told about the fountain which is to be placed first in front of the Children's Building at the World's Fair, and afterwards on one of Chicago's streets, where thirsty men and women and children, horses and dogs, can get cool water on the hot days. Ten cents each from temperance children all over the world will pay for the fountain and the names of the little contributors are to be enrolled in the Temperance Temple.

There was a great deal of talk about this, and while the children were talking, Miss Edgeworth counted the money they had given her.

"How much do you think we have, children? Just four dollars. Now, if we each send a dime out of this to Miss Gordon for the fountain, how much would that be in all?"

"Two dollars."

"And that is exactly half of what we have now. Let us vote on it."

They voted unanimously to send two dollars to Miss Gordon, at Evanston, Ill., for the children's fountain and two dollars to the National W. C. T. U. treasurer at The Temple, Chicago, for the self-denial fund.

Miss Edgeworth sent a letter herself to each place, and in each one she told this little story:

"But the coin that shines the brightest is that given by little Ellie Foster. Her parents are both dead and she lives with a family who give her her clothes and board in return for all the work they can make her do. Her baby brother has been adopted by some people in the country and once a month Ellie goes to see him 'stageing' it all the way. She has to earn her money for stage fare as best she can. She is a very earnest little Legioner and when she related the story to me said, even while the tears stood in her eyes: 'Bennie is too little to miss me and I thought maybe God could do something with the money if I gave it to Him and staid home this month.'"

But Miss Edgeworth did not tell how, a week later she denied herself a long-promised day's rest and went with Ellie to see the baby brother, not only paying the fare, but making the little temperance girl's heart rejoice because of a long, happy day with the two she loved best in all the world—her brother and her teacher.

I believe if that L. T. L. ever grows up to be a W. C. T. U., King Alcohol will tremble on his throne.

QUEEN VICTORIA has forty grandchildren and a generous supply of great-grandchildren.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Did you ever give up anything that you wanted very badly in order that some one else might be benefited? That was being generous, for generosity consists, in not merely giving a part of our plentiful supply but in denying ourselves for the good of others. Self-denial it is sometimes called, and we are never truly generous when we give unless we do without something for ourselves.

Now the big temperance family to which we all belong is going to have a Self-denial party to which we are invited, April 3–10. To join the company, we are asked to deny ourselves something during that week. It may be candy or peanuts, car-rides or something we have thought very necessary, and instead of spending the money for these, we will send it to the National treasurer of the W. C. T. U., at the Temperance Temple in Chicago for the self-denial fund. In this way we will help to "wreathe the white ribbon around the world," and ring in the better times. Write and tell the Cozy Corner about your part in it.

Yours for temperance in every land,

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

In reading the Cozy Corner, I failed to see a letter from Idaho, so thought I would write. The Washingtoniar society was organized in April, 1840, by six men in a Baltimore drinking club who pledged themselves not to drink any spirits, wine or cider and called their organization the Washingtonian Temperance Society. I will try and send a dime to the children's fountain in Chicago, as every little helps. IRWIN PIERSON.

Thank you for the facts about the beginning of the Washingtonian society, Irwin. Who will tell us about its work?

I am a boy seven years old with a figure two on the right side of the figure seven and I weigh eighty pounds with a figure one just before the eight. My name is Isaac, the son of David. If you will please let me into your Cozy Corner I will try and be good and once in a while will write a short letter which you can drop in the waste basket if it is not fit to publish and I may also send some puzzles occasionally. Fill up the mite-boxes, children, for in this way you are surely helping to build up the temperance cause.

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U., sending the same, through the authorized channels, to the treasurer of her nation, asking her to send it to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

GOD'S HIGHWAY OF EXODUS.

Let us gratefully consider what the temperance cause is doing for women. It is leading us outside the hedges of a narrow sectarianism. Going into the streets to pray meant going beyond denominational walls and clasping hands with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in such sincerity as leads them to "rescue the perishing." This temperance work is also revealing to us the absurdity of always standing below the cataract to grasp, often vainly, for those who have made the fearful plunge, instead of stationing guards above it to keep the ignorant and unwary from falling in. It has taught us also that, as God has given us eyes which can look up and around, but not within ourselves, the most healthful Christian life is one that gazes lovingly into the face of Christ and helpfully around upon humanity, instead of tiring itself out with morbid introspection. Slowly we are discovering, with happiness that mocketh speech, that this fight against home's bitterest enemy is God's highway of the exodus for half the race.

Wonderful indeed are the orderings of heaven by which to-day in thousands of communities our unions are the nucleus of such study as women of the church and home never before gave to the structure of the human body and God's health decalogue written therein. Think what it means for her who is priestess of the cradle to follow lines of work and study which keep steadily before her thought the fact that the body is sacred, and that the rules of its well-being are religious, inasmuch as they are the ritual of the temple of the Holy Ghost written in natural law.

The mediæval monastery taught men to despise the body; the modern home will teach them to reverence and ennoble it by sedulously cultivated habits of pure living. Steadily cherishing this thought, our temperance women will go beyond the study of the pitiful effects of the alcohol and nicotine habits upon their sons, to the closely-related topics of diet, dress, cleanliness, ventilation and exercise, as helps or hindrances, not to their sons only, but to the best development of themselves. Indeed, we have heard more than one of them say already that she never drank a cup of water, partook of food, or provided for the ventilation of her sleeping-room as a religious act until this temperance work had wrought into her thinking and her conscience this reverent appreciation of God's other revelation written in our members. Dressmakers and shoe merchants are receiving instructions for more generous measurements and sizes than formerly from temperance women, and a simpler style of diet and adorning is among the reflex influences upon the home, for which we thank God and take courage. As the work goes on and our study of these solemn and beautiful truths of God grows deeper, the dense ignorance and heart-breaking indifference of both men and women to the laws that govern that incomparable sacrament, the genesis of an immortal spirit, will be slowly overcome.

Dr. Richardson says this whole subject of inherited tendencies waits, and will go on waiting, till women take it up. But they will do so as one reflex of our work; and when its sacred laws are understood, taught and obeyed, we shall see the banished pair returning to the Eden early lost, and our sorrowful race, so long defiled, shall come back to its Father and its God. Verily, if those close-clasped hands had never parted company our poor old world had been a happier place to-day. It is not good for man to be alone. In college, camp and court his deterioration is the patent obstacle against which even our Christian civilization contends in vain.

Until we get the stereoscopic view from the different angles of vision which man's eye and woman's furnish, government will remain the Chinese picture that it is, without the vividness and perspective of truth. We are learning that our work is not along the line of the woman question merely, but the deeper, higher, and far more sacred human question. The laws of heredity and six thousand years of education have developed in woman the instinct of speech and the faculty of government. She has always been chief legislator in the little principality of home, and no queen ever had subjects more loving or more loyal. The scientific method and the teachings of the gospel (invariably harmonious when both are reverently studied) have ever favored the exercise of these two predominant gifts of what will always be "the gentler sex." Literature was the first field open to us, then co-education, then occupation, then—in the widest sense—philanthropy. Prejudice predicted failure in each, but was mistaken. Conservatism prophesied the loss of womanly character and deportment as the too costly price of preferment in all, but its fears have not been realized.

Ere long the Christian womanhood of our country will come to church and state, earnestly asking that, for the highest good of each, woman's full power of speech and legislation shall be exercised in both. The masses who drink and sell intoxicants are not reached by the usual means of grace; but two-thirds of Christ's church are women, whose persuasive voices will be a reinforcement quite indispensable to the evangelizing agencies of the more hopeful future. A horde of ignorant voters, committed to the rum power, fastens the dram-shops like a leech on our communities; but let the Republic take notice that our unions are training an army to offset this horde, one which will be the only army of voters specifically educated to their duty which has ever yet come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. For slowly but surely the reflex influence of this mighty reform, born in the church and nurtured at the Crusade altars, is educating women to the level of two most solemn and ominous ideas: 1. That they ought to vote. 2. That they ought to vote against grog-shops. The present generation will not pass away until in many of the states this shall all be fulfilled, and then, America, beloved mother of thrice grateful daughters, thou shalt find rallying to thy defence and routing the grimy hosts that reel about thee now, an army of voters which absenteeism will not decimate and money cannot buy. Under the influence of our societies may be safely tried the great experiment that agitates the age, and which upon the world's arena most of us have feared.

When we desire this "home protection" weapon, American manhood will place it in our hands. These benign changes will not come suddenly, but as the result of a profound change in the convictions of the thoughtful and conscientious, followed by such a remoulding of public sentiment as this class always brings about when once aroused. First of all, the best and truest men must be convinced that womanliness can never be legislated out of being, but that as it has survived the days when women wove and spun, picked their own geese and did their own dyeing; as it has borne bravely up amid the crash of old theories concerning how much a woman might know, and how little she might do, womanliness is likely to prove the grandest recorded instance of the survival of the fittest, based upon natural law.

Among the reflex influences by which this temperance work has broadened our outlook and enriched our hopes, we must speak of the sweet and tender lesson of white-ribbon homes to those of us who "go about." We have learned how such solemn vicissitudes as come into the lives of women only help to confirm their faith in the world invisible. The breath of eternity falls on their foreheads like baptismal dew in those hours of unutterable pain and danger when a little child is born. Their steps lie along the borderland of this closely-curtained world,

"And palpitates the veil between,
With breathings almost heard."

Into their eyes fall the first mystic glances of innocent and trusting souls. Tender little hands folded in prayer and winsome voices saying,

"Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
Look upon a little child,"

have done more than all traditional restraints to keep motherly hearts loving and unworldly. Always this will be so; always from manhood's more exterior view of life's significance, women are separated by the deepest and most sacred experiences which human hearts may know. That anchor holds. But God has given the mother-heart for purposes of wider blessing to humanity than it has dreamed as yet. Let us go gently forward until that loving, faithful heart shall be enthroned in the places of power; until the queens of home are queens indeed.

And best of all, the hand of Him whose gospel has lifted us up into these heavenly places in Christ Jesus; of Him who was a brother to the Marys, and who, in His hour of mortal agony, did not forget His mother—that pierced hand points out the way.

W. C. T. U. RED LETTER DAYS.

The World's and National W. C. T. U. having set apart certain days of the year as worthy of special observance, we hereby call attention to them, noting briefly the reason for and the advantage in their observance by the W. C. T. U. The manner of the observance must of course depend upon local circumstances and surroundings.

Among the red-letter days of our calendar we find three which we celebrate in common with all American citizens—Washington's Birthday, Inauguration Day, and the Fourth of July. We suggest that our unions take advantage of these days of national prominence to get in some distinctive W. C. T. U. work. Let us "lend our influence" as far as we may in directing the trend of public thought and action upon all occasions of national interest.

The special W. C. T. U. days are as follows:

ANNIVERSARY DAY. Every union is asked to commemorate its own birthday. A review of its work, presented by the superintendents of the different departments represented, combined with a praise service, is always fitting upon this occasion, and tends to awaken new zeal among the workers. If the exercises can be public they may serve, further, to enlist the sympathies of outsiders and to increase the general good will of the people toward our organization, at the same time furnishing excellent opportunity for adding to the list of members.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE DAY. The first Sunday in April is to be "observed by public services in the interest of the American Sabbath." As an organization the W. C. T. U. stands with the evangelical churches in upholding the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath, and in emphasizing the benign influences of a rigid observance of this day upon the human soul and body. In view of the recent victory for the Christian rest day in America, it seems fitting that the churches and the W. C. T. U. should, in the services of Sunday, April 2, unite hearts and voices in special praise and thanksgiving. Falling, as this red-letter day does this year, upon Easter Sunday, it is more than ever appropriate for the Christian world to consider and promulgate the claims of the first day of the week in the light of gospel teaching. Special effort must be made to impress upon the minds of the young—our coming citizens—the sacredness of the Sabbath and the dangers involved in its desecration.

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, April 3-10. A faithful observance of the week of denial would bring about a general uplift all along the lines, while the work carried forward by means of the funds thus contributed would be blessed by a mighty outpouring of the spirit. We believe our women are more fully aroused to the fitness and to the far-reaching consequences of a periodic, united effort by which they may throw kindly thought and helping hands round the world. Therefore we look for great results from seed sown during the approaching period of self-denial. Who can say what the harvest shall be in this year of '93, laden as it is with unusual opportunities for seed sowing?

FLOWER MISSION DAY, June 9. The birthday of our universally beloved and lamented Jennie Casseday, originator of the flower mission work, to be observed as doubtless all unions are aware, "by sending flowers with text-cards to prisons, jails, hospitals and almshouses, and to the poor and the sick everywhere." The day will this year partake of the nature of a memorial. We shall gather the pure and fragrant blossoms in affectionate remembrance of the gentle life which has so recently passed from earthly sight; a life physically helpless, but oh, how spiritually helpful! When the holy influence which radiated from that sick bed in Louisville, Ky., reached out and drew within its sphere the heart and brain of Frances Willard it breathed the loving thought of a Christ-like character into American womanhood, and the result is that wherever the W. C. T. U. message is carried the power of that influence is felt. The sweet spirit of Jennie Casseday follows the white ribbon round the earth, and her name is known and loved the world over.

World's W. C. T. U. Day, September 22. "The birthday of Mary Clement Leavitt, our first round-the-world missionary, and observed as World's W. C. T. U. thank-offering day." It is suggested that every local union wherever practicable, hold a public meeting in the interest of international W. C. T. U. work. Give in a bright, crisp manner some history of the work of our round-the-world missionaries, of their faith and courage, and of the abundant blessings which have attended their labors in behalf of God and Home and Humanity. The story of Miss West's visit to Japan, with the touching circumstances of her death in that far-off land, cannot fail to stir the hearts of the people, while an account of the rapid increase of W. C. T. U. forces in other lands than ours will open their eyes to the versatile and practical nature of W. C. T. U. effort, and perhaps open their purses also.

Membership Crusade Day and Children's Harvest Home, September 28. "The birthday of Frances E. Willard, President of the World's and National W. C. T. U." Of course all loyal unions will not fail to celebrate this doubly honored red-letter day. Any form of observance in which children participate is sure to enlist the coöperation of parents. And it is desirable for many reasons that this day be made of wide-awake interest to the little folks. We would have the name of our organization and of Frances Willard, household words in every land; we would have that of our beloved leader enshrined in the hearts of our embryo citizens side by side with those of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln as one of this country's greatest patriots; one who is serving the present age in as needed and as intrepid a manner as those heroes served theirs; one who, leading others by precept and example to do and to dare, has earned the right to be called the saviour of her country. We regard Mother Thompson as the Washington and Frances Willard as the Lincoln of the white-ribbon reform.

Day of Prayer, October 31. "For the work and workers, and for unity of spirit in the National convention." It needs no words of ours to intensify the consciousness in the hearts of all W. C. T. U. women of the power of prayer. The organization is proverbially a praying band and itself stands a monument to answered prayer. What mountains have been removed, what victories gained through the united petition of consecrated motherhood!

Considering the number of religious and political creeds represented by the W. C. T. U., our National conventions have been marvels of harmony, due, we do not hesitate to say, to the fervent devotional spirit which always pervades these assemblies. As we meet in the special prayer service of this red-letter day let us remember that we have abundant reason to come boldly to the throne of grace. The experience of "them Rock of Ages women" is that the more they ask for the more they get.

Peace Day, December 18. "Observed in the interests of peace and national and individual arbitration." A day upon which white-ribboners the world over are urged to join hands in promoting brotherly love and good will among all the nations. "Blessed are the peacemakers." If the World's Convention had done nothing more than inaugurate the observance of an international Peace day it would have accomplished great things. The presentation of this subject tends to practical application of the principles of arbitration, and must result in a wonderful impetus in all lines of Christian effort. It is preëminently the province of Christian womanhood to lead the world to a higher standpoint upon this question—a standpoint more in harmony with the teachings of the gospel.

Crusade Day, December 23. "The anniversary of the going forth of the Crusade Band at Hillsboro, Ohio, 1873." This going forth and the consequent rise of the W. C. T. U. power is classed in history as one of the greatest events of the nineteenth century. It is well that once a year at least we relate the story of that wonderful uprising which spread with such amazing force and rapidity over the length and breadth of the land, awakening not only our own nation but all Christendom from its apathy regarding the saloon evil. Every W. C. T. U. woman is stimulated to fresh effort by its recital, and the holy fervor of the crusaders is still capable of inspiring a kindred spirit in the hearts of men and women who listen to it. In the words of one enthusiastic recruit, "the stirring events of that revolutionary epoch are enough to make the fingers itch and the toes tingle to hold aloft the W. C. T. U. banner, and rush to the front of the fray."

So let us say to W. C. T. Unions from Chicago to the ends of the earth, with all your observing do not fail to observe Crusade Day, the last, but by no means the least on our red-letter day calendar.

Pledge.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquor, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

Question.—I would like to ask what your opinion of moxie is? Mrs. A. G. Sargent.

Answer.—Moxie contains three per cent of alcohol, hence is not a temperance drink. Our opinion is, let it alone.

Q.—Would a sculptured bow of white ribbon be out of place on the monuments of our translated members?

A.—We think it is an exceedingly ornamental and appropriate design, and recommend its adoption.

Editors.

Q.—Can a state officer or superintendent send her ballot for state officers in a sealed envelope to the state convention and there have it opened and deposited for her?

A.—No, she cannot. She must be present and deposit her own vote; unless the state constitution explicitly states that this can be done, which is not probable and would be a strange manner of voting.

Caroline B. Buell.

Q.—Are individual contributions to department work acknowledged?

A.—Only by the persons to whom they are given; they do not come to a treasurer, hence no acknowledgment can come officially. The proper way for such contributors, is to send their donations to the treasurer for a specified purpose; they would then reach the desired destination and also be in the channel for public recognition.

Q.—When does a member of a W. C. T. U. cease to be a member by non-payment of dues? Should the name of a member be dropped without being considered by the union?

A.—There is no written law in the W. C. T. U. regarding the matter. It is the duty of the treasurer to collect dues and after a woman has failed to respond and time has passed, the usual rule is to drop the name. She certainly could not be counted by the treasurer in sending dues to the state treasurer. It would, perhaps, be well for the local union to fix some general rule by which the treasurer could be governed, for there must come a time sooner or later when she cannot count a person who is delinquent in dues, a member of the union. In the matter of gathering dues the treasurer has a duty to perform and she has no right to neglect it, but there comes a time when her duty ceases.

Esther Pugh.

Q.—Does Prohibition prohibit in Maine in spite of the frequent assertions to the contrary?

A.—It does. Senator Frye said last winter in the United States Senate that the Maine law had practically driven liquor selling out of three-quarters of our state. He did not overstate it. I have been in nearly every locality and I know. I think to compare the "benefits" which are claimed for high license with those under prohibition is as strong as any line of talk on the question. The town in which is my home is a small city of 7,000 inhabitants. Not a drop of liquor (not even cider) is sold within its borders. Accordingly, very little is drank. Very likely a few do send to Massachusetts and get it; a few others by lying may get it at the Portland liquor agency (that abomination which has to be because some doctors will prescribe it in some forms and hence people think they must have it in cases of sickness) but on the whole it is a sober, thrifty town. Before the Maine law was enacted it was poor and disreputable. There are seven post-offices in the town. I am sure under license they would have as many licensed places and fully as many more unlicensed places, for I believe that the prohibitory laws are more easily enforced than are license laws.

It is so unlike any other business. A licensed grain-dealer might interest himself to stop an unlicensed grain-dealer, because it is not true of a horse or a pig that the more they eat the more they want, as it is of the man who drinks—he wants more and more and after a time the licensed man wants some "outlaw" to take him as he has gotten too low for a "respectable place." This is true, that I do not know of an intelligent man or woman in Maine who believes in total abstinence who does not believe in prohibition. The opponents to the law are opponents to total abstinence, if the truth could be proven.

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens,

Pres. Maine W. C. T. U.

When I ask some people to sign the pledge for others' sake they purse up their lips and say, "Am I my brother's keeper?" No, but you are something a great deal higher than that, you are your brother's brother and in duty bound to act accordingly.

Mr. John G. Woolley said in a recent speech: "Those who oppose us complain that there is nothing new in our speeches. Very well, there is nothing new about love, about sin, about death, but they are subjects well worth talking of, and form the staple of all the books and all the speeches in the world."

The latest thing in its line that I have come across is the "National Insurance Company against Burglary" established in London. The questions asked are suggestive, for instance: Are your doors and windows properly fitted with suitable locks and fastenings? Do you leave your premises unoccupied at any time, and if so to what extent? Have you any roof lights or windows or trap doors to basement? Have your premises at any time been entered by thieves, and if so how did they gain access? It is interesting to note that sleeping rooms and flats are charged the least, shooting houses and farm houses the next; and mansion houses the highest price. Of other premises, shoe shops are the least and jewelers the most. Athletic and other prizes, silver plate, etc., are insured during the time they are displayed for public inspection at fairs, etc. "Alack and alas, upon what times we have fallen!"

A little boy in Sunday-school was asked to define consciousness, and when he hesitated a further query was put: "What is it that makes you feel so bad when you have been disobedient?" "Oh," he said, "that is father's leather strap."

Perhaps a good definition of the do everything policy of the W. C. T. U. would be that it is the "live and let live" policy, forced upon no one but freely open to any and all.

Retribution for evil doing is sure to come, but seldom is it so sure and speedy as in the following true tale: At the beautiful little town of Garfield, Whitman county, Washington, nearly six months ago an effort to establish a saloon was opposed by all except two of the business men of the place, who gave as their reason that "it would injure their business." The saloonist thus secured his license, paying one thousand dollars, and commenced his work. A loved son of one of the above mentioned business men became intoxicated with whisky from the saloon, and suffered exposure which brought on a disease from which he died. In December nearly a half dozen boys of the town went to the saloon, some of whom were good in disposition when sober; they became drunk and, attacking a harmless and honored citizen, killed him. This citizen was the other business man of the town who had feared to "injure his business!" These sorrowful and impressive facts need no comment.

Miss Anna Gordon spoke recently to a large audience of Band of Hope children in the city of Glasgow, Mr. Wilson, M. P., presiding. It has been repeatedly said by those who have listened to her in England that she is the best talker to children they have ever heard.

A gentleman who had a well-deserved reputation for discovering admirable traits in all the people about him, was asked how he acquired such a happy faculty. He answered, "It is not a faculty but a habit, and it sprung from the early training of my mother; she always said to her children, 'There is good in every man, woman and child, you have only to look carefully and you will find it.'" This gentleman was one of a family of seven children, and it was an unwritten law in that household that people were to be kindly discussed, and when any name came up each one was to try and think of something good to say about that person. Somebody who heard this recital asked with anxiety, "Is there not some danger of inculcating flattery and insincerity by such a method?" "I hardly think so," was the reply with a somewhat quizzical expression. "Experience has taught me that flattery is seldom wasted on the absent, and insincerity has but a slight hold in a spirited family discussion." I wish that every white-ribbon household had the rule here given.

On Duty.

NEBRASKA.

THIS, THAT AND THE OTHER.

The railroad department of work has been especially favored this winter in Nebraska. At the National Convention in Denver last November, Mrs. C. M. Woodward, of Seward, Neb., was made National superintendent of this department, a most judicious selection, as from her former position as associate superintendent she was perfectly familiar with all the work.

Miss Jennie Smith, the National evangelist of this department, has spent some time in this state since the convention. With these two in the field, and the earnest efforts of our state superintendent, Mrs. Sarah Smith, of Lincoln, a great interest in religion and temperance, has been aroused among the railroad men. Meetings for railroad men have been held in many places by these ladies.

In Omaha meetings were begun last May in the Union Pacific shops, which have been kept up every week since. The attendance has reached as high as 188, but averages about ninety. They are conducted by Miss Hester Miller. Jennie Smith held a very successful two-weeks' meeting in Council Bluffs, Iowa, and later one in Kansas City, both of which were a great influence for good to the railroad men of Nebraska who run to those cities.

And the railroad men appreciate what is done for them. Said one of them to a white-ribboner, "I am surprised that you do not get one fare for your conventions. Your organization does a great amount of good among the railroad men, and I should think you would get one fare in consideration of that."

Not long since a lady traveling in this state was passing through the cars when the conductor politely offered to assist her with her baggage, saying, "I see you belong to the white-ribboners." Immediately a lady in the rear exclaimed, "So do I, can't you help me, too?" The conductor turned, and after a careful look said politely, "That may be, madam, but you lack the visible sign." Moral: It always pays to wear the white ribbon.

The Union Worker, our state paper, which was enlarged last fall, comes to us twice a month, brighter and better with every issue. Nothing escapes the keen eye and thought of its editor that can possibly be made of use to our work. At present the various departments are being presented by their superintendents, two in each issue. It has been thus planned by its editor, to become the means of communication between superintendents and local unions, but this wise plan is frustrated to a great extent by the neglect of the state paper by the unions. It is safe to say that the efficiency of the W. C. T. U. in Nebraska would be increased three-fold, if not more, if a dozen copies of the Union Worker were taken in each union.

THE UNION SIGNAL brings to us the news from the world—this we all want. The Worker tells us what is being done in our own state and makes known to us our leaders' desires and wishes concerning our work. Let every union appoint a superintendent whose duty it shall be to take subscriptions, at fifty cents each, and send to Mrs. O. H. Jones, Hastings, Neb. You will get your money's worth, for a brighter paper doesn't exist.

Our Y work is at a disadvantage this year, the superintendent elected last fall declining to serve. It is hoped that an able leader for this important department may be selected by the executive committee at their semi-annual meeting.

Miss Lillie Williams, who succeeded Mrs. Blair as superintendent of L. T. L. work, is taking it up in an earnest and encouraging manner. She has held a novel entertainment in her own local L. T. L., which seemed to do much good. It was an essay contest. The young people of the legion wrote essays upon subjects taught in their meetings. Judges were appointed, the essays read in public, with a ten cent admission, and a young people's Bible given for first prize, small booklets being given to each of the others.

After the entertainment eight new names were signed to their pledge roll, some young men throwing their cigars into the stove. One gentleman said, "I felt perfectly ashamed of myself as I listened to those essays written by young girls, and I have resolved to make a desperate effort to give up my tobacco. If I succeed I will sign the pledge." The prize essay was printed in the Union Worker, and although the writer was but thirteen years old, it contained as much truth as many sermons and was very earnestly and neatly expressed. Like all our W. C. T. U. work there is in this a reflex influence upon the workers, which will surely fit and prepare each of them for greater usefulness hereafter.

Nebraska, having had the faithful services of Mrs. E. A. Blair for a number of years, keenly feels her loss. It was she who so successfully worked up the Demorest medal contest work, until at one time Nebraska girls held the only three diamond medals ever given, and now stands at the head of all the states in the number of contests held. Mrs. W. C. Rogers, of Springfield, has been appointed by Mr. Demorest as state superintendent, in place of Mrs. Blair, who will make a temporary home in San Diego, Cal. On her way to that place we notice a number of addresses made and L. T. L's organized in Wyoming. Mrs. Blair will work wherever she goes, and we wish her success.

Active work in the legislature has commenced. Mrs. Zara A. Wilson, state superintendent of franchise, has had introduced into both senate and house, a municipal suffrage (for women) bill, and one asking for a police matron in cities of 20,000 inhabitants; in the house, a bill asking for full suffrage for women and, by request, a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to women on the ground that as they cannot protect themselves by the ballot, the law should protect them as it does Indians, insane persons and habitual drunkards.

Mrs. G. W. Clark, state superintendent of social purity, is working for a bill to raise the age of consent to eighteen years. Mrs. A. Roberts, superintendent of narcotics, is asking that the convicts in the penitentiary be not allowed tobacco in any form, but that fruit be substituted for it; also, that the convicts, when willing, be treated for the tobacco habit. Mrs. Bittenbender will try for statutory prohibition. All this means work and none of us can tell at this time what will be the result.

Our Miss Ripley, state superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, is winning laurels at home and abroad.

Before the associations for the advancement of women, at Memphis, Tenn., she spoke a number of times, as well as in various places in the city. The Little Rock, Ark., Woman's Chronicle, in its report of the congress, gives Miss Ripley frequent commendatory notices. She believes that all young women who aspire to home-making should have instruction in kindergarten work. A home, she declared, is no home without children and the mothers ought to know how to teach and interest the children. She thinks it a sad commentary on the women of America, that 400,000 children die annually. Miss Ripley spoke also upon scientific temperance instruction.

And, by the way, concerning this Woman's Congress, the Kansas City Star said, "The new heavens and the new earth are coming 'round the bend at Memphis." More truth, perhaps, than they realized, for in all this work of women shines the glowing sign of the new order of things, the "good times" so long coming. Upon this same line of thought Miss Ripley responded to the toast, "The New Womanhood," at the anniversary luncheon of the Nineteenth Century Club of Kearney, Neb. She also spoke under the auspices of this club recently, giving her fine lecture on Columbus.

Work on the W. C. T. U. history for the Columbian Exposition is progressing quite satisfactorily. Many very interesting papers are in the hands of the commissioner, Mrs. Ada Bittenbender, and it is hoped to have a complete history which shall be a credit to Nebraska. Mrs. Olive M. Leader has arranged to represent her department of work among soldiers by a unique banner of linen made exclusively by women almost a hundred years ago. This is beautifully embroidered with a shield and flags in the national colors, above them, in gold colored silk, "Peace I bring unto you," and below, the Christian soldiers' watchword, "Take the helmet of salvation, the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God," and below this an open Bible resting on a bed of wild sunflowers. The banner is suspended from a rod made from a tree planted by the soldiers at old Fort Calhoun, during the time it was occupied as a military post. From the bottom are suspended miniature cannon balls made from the same wood.

ITEMS.

The state minutes are out in a very neat and attractive form, the work of our state treasurer, Mrs. Mary M. Lantry, of Omaha, of whom they may be obtained, twenty for one dollar.

Mrs. S. C. O. Upton, the newly appointed evangelistic superintendent is doing good work. She gives us, in each issue of the Union Worker, a helpful Bible reading.

Mrs. Lydia Irons, National superintendent of the department of mercy, spent some time in our state this winter, speaking in the towns of the Elkhorn Valley.

Pleasant incidents connected with the Convention at Denver, are still frequently experienced. Mrs. Maydole, the president of Dodge county, while at Jamestown to give a report of her visit to the convention, was entertained in the home of the M. E. minister who had organized the society in Denver from which has grown Trinity church where the convention was held. As Brother Adriance is a man now only fifty-seven years of age, the miraculous growth of that beautiful city may be realized. His circuit extended far up in the mountains and their first home was Golden City, where the excursion stopped a few minutes on its way to Silver Plume. Mrs. Adriance, who shared with her husband the struggles of pioneer life, is president of the union at Jamestown.

Mrs. Belle Bigelow, of Lincoln, state superintendent of foreign work, received 6,543 votes for state superintendent of public instruction on the Prohibition ticket. There is no doubt as to where Nebraska Prohibitionists stand on the woman question.

Railroad fare to the next National convention, is offered as one of the premiums of the Union Worker. We who enjoyed the last, feel like saying, "May we all be there."

INDIANA JOTTINGS.

The Indiana letter has been delayed, not on account of lack of faithful effort and work throughout our state, but because of sprained and stiffened wrist and fingers on the part of your correspondent.

Miss Reed, editor of the Organizer, has been so seriously ill that her friends despaired of her recovery, but in answer to prayer, as Miss Reed herself says, she is now much better. Mrs. Moat, associate editor, has faithfully carried out her work, and the paper has regularly made its appearance.

Editor Clark, of the Phalanx, has been doubly bereaved by the death of his father and daughter. Brother Clark and his good wife have the sympathy of every Prohibitionist in the state.

The work of reform is still actively pushed in Indiana. Prof. F. T. McWhirter is the new chairman of the Indiana prohibition central committee, vice Dr. H. J. Hall, resigned, and we feel sure the work will not suffer in his hands.

LOCAL NOTES.

"I am not sure that life to any one
A fuller measure or contentment brings,
With all its gifts, than in the draught which springs
From honest work, well planned, and bravely done," therefore it gives me great pleasure to note the work of the great resource of the W. C. T. U., "the rank and file." Harriet Steckel, of the Mulberry union, writes that they served dinner on election day, making sixteen dollars for their work. The Happy Four Quartette visited them twice. Dr. Aaron Work has spoken for them. They held a memorial service for Madam Willard. This union also discusses topics of interest to our work at each meeting.

Mrs. Sarah M. Ranney writes that the Brazil union celebrated its tenth anniversary at the home of Mrs. C. E. Wilder. All who had ever held a membership with this union were invited, and almost all responded. Mrs. W. T. Moss, president, reported the state convention. A feast of good things had been prepared by the hostess, and upon entering the dining-room each guest was presented with a tin spoon tied with a white ribbon, as a souvenir of this tenth anniversary of their union.

Mrs. Lou E. Rall writes that Huntington union has stepped to the front in the work of the mercy department of which Mrs. Rall is state superintendent. They have pledged their aid to the Huntington humane society, and our superintendent feels certain that she has true friends who will hold up her hands in every effort.

Mrs. F. K. Pattison writes of Mrs. Denny's four days' work at Evansville. On the first day and evening she was present at the county convention, giving a report of the National convention. The second day she spoke in the holiness meeting in the Simpson M. E. Chapel. She spent the third day at the Orphan's home, speaking to the L. T. L. in the home. The colored home was also visited. That evening Mrs. Denny spoke at High Street Methodist church. Sunday morning she was at Kingsley M. E. church and at the jail in the afternoon. The Alice Palmer union, which meets in the Simpson chapel was visited also and her last address was given in High Street Presbyterian church.

Lena Sampson, Hebron, writes of a recent intellectual and spiritual feast from Mrs. Calkins, their Denver delegate. In the annual election of this union, Mrs. C. Flint was elected president.

Mrs. Belle Barrett, Stewartsville, corresponding secretary, writes they have just finished their first year's work. The new officers are as follows: President, Mrs. Ella Defer; vice-president, Mrs. Maria Barrett; treasurer, Mrs. Zerelda Cross; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Belle Barrett. This union was organized by Mrs. Balch and has fifteen members.

At the home of Mrs. E. E. Hayward, West Lebanon, assembled a goodly number of true and tried white-ribbon comrades to give farewell to Mrs. S. J. Whitten, their faithful county treasurer, who removes to Harvey, Ill. An elegant repast was served and each guest was presented with favors from the unions, a neatly tinted card with our national motto inscribed thereon, and a sprig of white chrysanthemum tied on the corner with our white ribbon. A beautiful album was presented Mrs. Whitten by the ladies of the union.

The corresponding secretary of Westville, Mrs. E. S. Scott, informs us that Westville has entered our ranks. A union of eleven enthusiastic members is the result of Mrs. Fields' visit to them.

Mrs. A. A. Cox, secretary, Azalia, writes of an enthusiastic meeting held in the Friends' church, and which, despite the rain, was well attended. Papers pertaining to our work carefully prepared were read and discussed. Two other papers were contributed by friends, not members of the union, which were highly appreciated by all present. The entire program, music, papers and discussion, reflect credit on the union and friends who were willing to participate. Let intelligent discussion go on.

Mrs. Jennie Ridgeway, Amboy, writes of unusual activity in their union. The newly-elected officers are already in active service. The union keeps three wall-pockets well supplied with temperance literature. They have made two quilts for the Hadley Home, and three others for needy people in their village. They have a visiting committee to visit the needy, sick and strangers. Their mothers' meetings are well attended, and the L. T. L. is in a flourishing condition. The collection taken at the union meeting of the churches was placed in the hands of the union for distribution among the poor. Twelve departments of work have been taken up. A committee from this union visits the county jail and infirmary.

Mrs. Sarah Oyler writes for North Manchester union. They held a Demorest medal contest lately, and Essie Fulhart won the medal. The Manchester L. T. L. is the pioneer L. T. L. of the state. This union has the sympathy of the churches and ministers, and here resides the efficient state superintendent of juvenile work, Mrs. K. T. A. Straw.

South Side Calvary union (Indianapolis) is the largest colored union in the state, and gave a temperance social a few nights ago. Mrs. Marshall of Pendleton, state superintendent, Mrs. McKehan and Mrs. Mae Mohler led the meeting with short discourses on women and temperance. Refreshments were served.

Mrs. A. M. Bartley, Elizabeth, writes of the brave and most successful attempt of this new union to hold a public service. The program consisted of songs, recitations, readings, papers and addresses.

Mrs. M. G. Rheubottom writes of the visit of Mrs. Tompkins, of Elkhart and Mother Trish, of Warsaw, to Middlebury. They came on Saturday and the meetings lasted until Tuesday evening.

The New Albany W. C. T. U. have moved their mission to State street. They have an average attendance at their Sunday-school of eighty scholars. This union also has held services at the state prison at Jeffersonville. So writes their faithful secretary, Gertie Sittason.

Minnie Davidson, Hayden, writes that President Martin, of Moores Hill College, lectured for them recently on the subject: "That boy—who shall have him?" As a result of this lecture they received sixteen new members. They also held a successful silver medal contest lately.

da New writes that Greenefield union has vn in numbers since organized by Miss ner. They have forty members and honoraries. This union has made and expended quite a lot of money. They thirteen subscribers to THE UNION L and quite a number for The Or- They have eight superintendents ing. Rev. Mary Miars is superintend- of social purity work. Under this de- nent the union has lectures and mothers' tings once a month. They had Mrs. hanan, police matron, of Indianapolis, h them a few weeks ago. Dr. Mary Bruner, member of the union, has given the union o excellent lectures; added to this they ve good papers prepared on different ases of the work and discussed. Five aper racks have been hung in the depot, ailworks, stove works and glass factories. Mrs. Coffie, the superintendent of literature, is vigilant and conscientious. The local press superintendent is Miss Solo Grey, a teacher of the public schools and an earnest Christian and temperance reformer. With the county press superintendent, Miss Mary E. Woodward, they are arranging to edit a column in each of the three weekly papers. Mrs. Anna Nigh, evangelistic superintendent does good work in her line, among the sick in body and soul. Jail and prison work is in the care of Mrs. Scirey and Miss Carter. Dr. Ada Smith has the flower mission work. Sunday-school work is under the charge of Mrs. C. W. Gant. At the last teachers' institute a paper was read upon this subject, "Why the effects of alcohol on the human system should be taught in our public schools." Mrs. J. H. Binford, the able president, has six excellent vice-presidents and Mrs. Gorman is a faithful secretary. This union wishes to start an exchange.

At the late election of officers at Sellersburg true and tried members were selected to lead. This union has an excellent L. T. L. of thirty members under the leadership of Mrs. Ella Sharp.

Indianapolis Central union, of which Mary A. Moody is corresponding secretary, writes of the proposed steps toward securing the coöperation of the clergy to secure by law the abolition of houses of ill repute.

Mrs. Trish spent four days with the Redkey union, and it was a great season of refreshing. They only wish they could have kept her two weeks.

Mrs. Gertrude Fulton, Portland, writes in retrospect of the past year. Their union meetings were regularly held in private houses. The monthly readings were a great source of strength. Flower mission day was observed by carrying flowers to the shut-ins. The semi-annual county convention was entertained by the Portland union. Mrs. Annie Hays, a faithful sister, went to her long home. The union has had a substantial growth during the year. A Thanksgiving dinner, the sixth of the kind, was given to the poor children and their mothers. This union has furnished a great deal of clothing and food for this class. Good work was done at the county fair.

The new union at Shoals defeated applications to sell at both the September and December terms of court.

West Side (Indianapolis) union has organized two L. T. L's, assisted by Mrs. Fields, one a senior and the other a junior L. T. L. The legions meet in the parlors of the West Side Congregational church. The pastor, Rev. D. Q. Travis, and the membership are warm friends to this work.

Miss Sarah P. Morrison, of Zerelda Wallace W. C. T. U. (Indianapolis) reports that Mrs. Clara Hoffman lectured for the union.

Miss Katie Riddle, Alton, writes of a public meeting held recently to bring the W. C. T. U. work before the public. To their aid was called the L. T. L., who by marches, songs and recitations, well illustrated that branch. Then a review of W. C. T. U. work was read by Mrs. Seacat. Temperance work from a gospel standpoint was discussed by Rev. N. S. Holcroft, of the Baptist church. These papers were followed by well-selected readings and songs.

Mrs. Straw, state superintendent, in her grand roll-call of the Indiana L. T. L., has the following summary: Enlisted membership, 9,264; pledged, 5,508; honorary, 222; teachers, 368; divisions, 62; companies, 162; county superintendents, 41; local superintendents, 170; amount of money received, $577.60; expended for all purposes, $525.60.

Mrs. Louise Thompson urges her superintendents to active coöperation with all Miss Greenwood's propositions. Mrs. Nellie Dungan, superintendent of Sunday-school work, also urges the plans of the National superintendent. Mrs. M. R. Dennis, superintendent of Sabbath observance, has been quite ill.

Mrs. Cowan has been busy in her work of mothers' meetings and has faithfully laid her plans before us through The Organizer. Miss Dickson has been busy and faithful. Miss Farly and Mrs. Fields are here, there and everywhere, leaving abundant testimonials of their efficiency wherever they go. Your correspondent received the quarterly conference license to preach in the U. B. Church December 4, and is taking the reading course, preparatory to entering the annual conference. Have been engaged in continuous evangelistic work since and have seen 130 souls happily converted. Pray for me that I may be humbly faithful.

Mrs. Perry, superintendent of soldiers' and sailors' work pleads for active work at the great encampment next September. Mrs. Rall of the department of mercy, sends greetings to her workers. La Porte, through Mrs. J. Black, gives the best report of Demorest work done I have yet read. The program was most excellent.

ACTIVE WORK.

Our quarterly meeting was held January 4, at headquarters. Receipts for the quarter were over seven hundred dollars. Mrs. Clinton Smith having resigned the position of treasurer, Mrs. T. A. Williams was elected to fill the vacancy. An interesting paper was read by Mrs. M. B. Platt, entitled "Our Organization, its Duties and Responsibilities." Mrs. Alden (Pansy) was elected parliamentary critic for the various official meetings of the organization. The reports of the departments were limited to five minutes each, and were followed by bright and spirited discussion.

The superintendent of narcotics reported that she had circulated petitions. The superintendent of purity in literature and art attended a mothers' meeting, and presented her work. She has addressed the union at Anacostia, and distributed one hundred pages of literature.

The alley mission meeting held each week shows an increase in interest. Seventy-five visits were made to residents. The people were willing to have God's word read and expounded, felt an interest in the mission and promised to attend the meetings whenever possible. The inhabitants are largely colored, and most of the women live at service, so that it is not always possible for them to attend the services; the children can always be gathered, as they are left at home to do the best they can.

The kindergarten was well attended during the summer and fall; we regret having to close it on account of the lack of means. The children were given a Christmas entertainment, December 30; handkerchiefs and aprons were given them, also ice cream and cake; it was touching to see their desire to share that which they received with their mothers.

The mission Sunday-school in Glick's alley, established months ago by the W. C. T. U., and which has done effective evangelistic work in that locality, was well attended on Christmas day, and a happy one it was to the little folks. Practically emphasizing the good accomplished, the school was that day in charge of William Washington, the man who has been so wondrously saved from drink and other dissipations, and most happily did he draw the contrast between this Christmas and that of one year ago. He said: "Now, boys, if the worst man in this alley could be so transformed, what may not you accomplish? I, who was the disturber and blasphemer, saved by the power of God."

The simple, honest confession had a telling effect upon the children, for none knew better his former life. Oranges, candies, etc., were distributed, and all went home happier and better for the Sunday-school and its work. This mission has been taken charge of by Lincoln Memorial church.

The report of evangelistic work shows that the number of meetings and Bible readings was eleven. Of literature, 1,256 pages have been distributed. The sick have been visited, and conversation and prayer have been held with the inmates of Hope and Help mission. There were thirty-five visits to the sick, and $1.38 has been expended.

The literature department distributed twelve thousand and eighty-four pages besides newspapers, magazines and one hundred and six pledge cards. They find barber-shops excellent places in which to put good literature.

Prison and jail workers distributed four hundred and sixty-six papers, twenty-two magazines and one hundred and twenty-five leaflets. They find many small boys among the prisoners, one whose face is very familiar, because of the number of times he has been there for stealing. A colored prisoner told them that he had an arrest of thought by a small card that had been put in his cell with these words on it, "Why do you wait?" God used it for his salvation and he is now rejoicing in the pardon of his sins.

Flower-mission work: On December 26 the district superintendent, accompanied by a number of workers, visited the almshouses and the hospitals connected therewith. These are the places in which to see the ravages sin has made. Would that it could have been possible to have had all who disbelieve in hereditary taint present that they might have seen a boy of twelve years, who presented an idiotic appearance, whose limbs were unsightly, whose bed must needs be a pen, because of ten or twelve spasms which he has daily. The physician in charge remarked, "This is a case of hereditary taint; this boy has never touched strong drink, but his parents are both addicted to it."

In one department there were several men being treated for drunkenness with the strychnine remedy; how glad the visitors were to tell them of the Mighty to save. Religious services were held in each department. Heaven came down our souls to greet, and we realized anew "that he that watereth shall be watered."

A wagon loaded with apples, oranges, grapes, nuts, candies, cakes, sugar and crackers were distributed among the various wards. The young ladies were especially welcomed by the old folks, and their gifts and attentions were gratefully received.

The superintendent of unfermented wine, said that the work done has been principally with the colored churches. A committee prepared grape juice or unfermented wine for free distribution among the churches, in order to convince them of the difference and by this means urging the use of the same in the future. Mrs. R. T. Brown attended a session of the colored Baptist association, presented the matter, and six churches decided to purchase grape juice if it would not incur any greater expense than the fermented wine. Mrs. A. P. Clarke attended the above association meeting and secured the passage of a resolution, recommending the use of unfermented wine in their churches.

Mrs. Watrous presented the subject to the colored Y. M. C. A., to a ministers' meeting and also to an Episcopal clergyman, sent leaflets and a letter to a prominent Presbyterian divine, who uses fermented wine at the communion. About 200 pages of literature have been distributed, six dollars expended and nine bottles of grape juice has been given to colored churches.

At the quarterly meeting of the Chapin union, the treasurer's report showed that including balance from previous year, the receipts were $114.72, of which $76.64 had been expended. The superintendent of evangelistic work reported over one hundred garments distributed to the poor.

Sabbath afternoon, January 1, a small audience assembled, the day being very inclement, at Wesley M. E. church, and enjoyed brief addresses by Madam Tel Seno, Mrs. M. E. Griffiths and Mr. Albert Griffin. The following resolution was passed: "We prayerfully appeal to every hostess who will entertain on New Year's day to desist from offering wine or any kind of liquors to her guests. This appeal is made with the knowledge that many a young man has dated his downfall from the social glass taken on New Year's day from the hand of some thoughtless friend who meant it only in kindness." The above was circulated through the daily press.

The district executive board received their friends from two till six o'clock, January 2, at headquarters. The rooms were prettily decorated. Among the receiving party were Madam Tel Seno, Mrs. Narcissa White Kinney and Mrs. M. E. Griffiths. The callers numbered from 150 to 200. Light refreshments were served and it proved a very pleasant occasion. At the close Mrs. La Fetra called upon Mrs. Kinney, Mrs. Griffiths and Dr. Dalby who made short addresses; the Central mission quartette sang several appropriate selections and Dr. Power led in prayer. Such social occasions are very profitable.

During the week of prayer, services were held each day at headquarters with the exception of Monday. On Tuesday, Mrs. M. Merrick was in charge. The subject was "White Ribbon Consecration." Thursday, Mrs. Alden (Pansy) read many texts giving the woes pronounced on those who deal in strong drink, and who uphold iniquity by law, "call evil good and good evil." She emphasized the responsibility of mothers in the home, the duty of teaching definite reasons for total abstinence clearly, that the children being forewarned might be forearmed. She made forcible comments from the text, "Woe unto them which justify the wicked for a reward," and said that to her the license system of this nation was applicable in this case.

Friday's subject was, "The Saloon's Allies," with Mrs. T. A. Williams in charge. Saturday's topic was, "Work among the Children," Mrs. Alfred Wood, superintendent juvenile work, conducting the meeting. On Sabbath, January 8, Mrs. Narcissa White Kinney addressed a mass-meeting at Vermont Avenue Christian church, her subject being "Looking Forward." On the afternoon of the same day the Capitol Hill Band of Hope celebrated their fifth anniversary. The exercises consisted of singing and recitations by the members and the presentation of a gold medal to the child who had secured the largest number of new members during the year. Short interesting addresses were made by Mrs. Alfred Wood and Major Walker. Fannie B. Paxon received the gold medal, having brought into the Band twenty-nine members. On January 9, a call to a week of prayer was made through the press, asking all Christian people to join in private prayer at twelve o'clock each day, that the law prohibiting the opening of the Columbian Exposition on the Sabbath be not repealed. At the hearings at the capitol for and against the proposed repeal, Rev. Dr. Herrick Johnson, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, of the National Sabbath Union, and Mrs. J. C. Bateham, of the National W. C. T. U. were among the speakers.

A reception was given Miss Elizabeth U. Yates, of Maine, and other visiting white-ribboners at Hotel Fredonia, January 21, by Dr. and Mrs. LaFetra. The parlors were tastefully decorated with palms and flowers and the rooms were crowded with guests. Mrs. S. D. LaFetra presided and Mrs. Emma F. Shelton acted as time-keeper. After remarks by Dr. LaFetra, Rev. Dr. Bacon, of Toledo, Ohio, spoke on "Woman's Ordination to the Ministry." He was followed by Miss Kate Foote, of the New York Independent. The "Opening of the Fair on Sunday" and "Woman in Journalism" were topics discussed by Mrs. C. Q. Murphy, editor of The Woman's Recorder, and "Closing the Fair," by Mrs. Annie Wittenmyer. Mr. R. E. Doan, Miss Emma Koeler, Miss E. U. Yates and Mr. L. G. Coffin also made speeches.

January 30, Miss Cora B. Thomas, superintendent of the Young Women's Christian Temperance Union of the District, gave a reception to all the Y unions of the city and their friends at the headquarters of the W. C. T. U. The rooms were crowded. Mrs. Alden read a story and Maj. J. A. Pickler, of South Dakota, made an address. Mrs. Pickler also spoke briefly. Refreshments were served.

Mrs. Mary Wood Allen, M. D., delivered a lecture, February 3, at the Church of Our Father, on the subject, "Bodily Religion." On Sabbath afternoon, she addressed a large and attentive audience (of ladies only) on "The Training of Children." Her address was a thoroughly instructive and practical one and at its conclusion so appreciative was the audience that it rose en masse and offered to the speaker a vote of thanks.

She explained the inexorable laws of heredity, and said every child had a right to be well born; that responsibility along these lines could not be evaded on account of ignorance or thoughtlessness in parents. "The sins of the fathers were visited upon the children to the third and fourth generations, etc." Parents should be truthful to their children. Pure lips should truthfully answer childhood's curious questions, for somebody will, and who should be better fitted to teach the child laws of purity and health than the intelligent, conscientious mother? The body was the temple of the Holy Spirit, and if childhood could be taught so to regard its own body, great streams of vice and immorality would be prevented.

Mrs. T. A. Williams tendered Dr. Allen a reception at her home. On February 8 the Crusaders and Y. W. C. T. U., held a Kaffee Klatsch at headquarters from seven to ten p. m.

February 14 the Y. W. C. T. U. of Vermont Avenue Christian church gave a delightful reception at the headquarters of the W. C. T. U., on H street.

North Capitol union held an open meeting February 15 at headquarters. There was a large audience and an excellent program. The president (Mrs. Margaret Platt) gave an address "On the Duties and Responsibilities of White-ribbon Women," from the text, "The Lord gave the word, and a multitude of women published it."

The roll call was responded to by telling how each woman made a dollar for the work. Among the items are the following: Baking bread, mending stockings, fancy work, plain sewing, taking care of a neighbor's baby, carrying a neighbor's basket, fasting, saving car fare, making candy, making iron holders. Temperance items were read, and a paper by Mrs. Havens, entitled, "Why One Woman Wants to Vote." Both addresses given were very fine.

The following petition was sent to the Senate of the United States, February 18:

"Believing that the liquors served in the incorporated clubs of this city are debauching and ruining hundreds of our young men, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District of Columbia prayerfully petition your honorable body to make no exceptions in the liquor license bill of the District favoring said clubs."

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

The King's Daughters of Louisville, Ky., passed touching resolutions in memoriam of Miss Jennie Casseday, their beloved friend and counselor.

The first Sunday in April (Easter Sunday), is to be World's Petition day in Indiana. The local unions of the state will ask to have the Petition read and voted upon in the churches.

As the result of an appeal published in the religious papers some years ago, three circulating libraries of eight hundred volumes each, are now in existence in various parts of North Dakota, through the efforts of Mr. George Roff, Yorktown, Dickey county. The fourth is now started and he hoped to have it completed by February 28, 1893, his seventy-fifth birthday. Books, temperance literature and other papers will be gladly received to be placed in these circulating libraries for needy settlers.

Any one having temperance literature or other good reading matter to pass on, can put it where it can do much good by sending it post or express paid to any of the following addresses: Mrs. M. A. Tapley, Columbus, Miss.; Mrs. M. B. Reese, Chautauqua, Wash.; Mr. J. C. Merton, Washington, Me.; Mr. Moses Hoch, Winslow's Mills, Me.; Mr. Geram Castner, Waldoboro, Me.; Mr. Patrick Black, Waldoboro, Me.; Kent Free Reading-room, Kent, King Co., Wash.; H. L. Bayard, Lexington, O. K.Ter.; Rev. G. W. Thompson, Highland Falls, N. Y.; Mrs. M. P. Brown, Cincinnati, Ill.; Mrs. J. T. Crowe, Jeffriesburg, Mo. and the following addresses in Utah: Mrs. Frances E. Smith, Provo; Mrs. J. Basham, Nephi; Mrs. A. M. Snow, Park City; Mrs. Frank Webster, American Fork; Mrs. Carrie Liddle, Salina; Rev. E. Clemenson, Richfield; Rev. Jos. Wilks, Mt. Pleasant; Mrs. G. W. Martin, Manti; Miss Kate Williamson, Brigham.

The bust of Miss Susan B. Anthony, the great pioneer of woman's enfranchisement, has been executed by Mr. Lorado Taft, the famous young Chicago sculptor. It is probably the most characteristic representation of Miss Anthony that has ever been put into clay, and has been so pronounced by distinguished women who are among her nearest friends. This bust will be one of the chief points of interest in the Woman's Department of the World's Exposition. The fund by which the expense is to be defrayed has not yet been raised, but one dollar apiece from two hundred women will make up the deficiency, or fifty cents apiece from four hundred, or twenty-five cents apiece from eight hundred. These facts are mentioned that the great army of thoughtful women who owe so much to Miss Anthony may have the pleasure of sending some practical token of gratitude to help express in imperishable marble the honor that they feel for her and which the whole world will yet acknowledge. All contributions are to be sent to Mrs. Mary E. Holmes, Hotel Willard, corner of Wabash avenue and Eighteenth street, Chicago, Ill.

SABBATH SCRAPS.

California is no longer without a Sabbath law, her legislature having passed a "Sunday Law" bill—good as far as it goes and open to amendment another year. Our efficient superintendent, Mrs. Armstrong, writes, "Our legislature has passed the Rest Day Bill. It gave me much hard work to conduct the petition work, and while we did not get all we asked, we are glad to get this. It provides one day of rest to all employés."

Snap Legislation. Look out for it all along the line. The New Jersey legislature introduced a bill legalizing the making and sale of Sunday newspapers, selling milk and riding or driving for recreation on Sunday, and it passed both houses in twenty-four hours, before the Ocean Grove authorities with whom it greatly interferes, knew what was going on.

Stalwart Pennsylvania. The same game was tried here, but the bill was staved off till friends could rally, a mass convention was held at Harrisburg, great enthusiasm aroused, and the Governor made a ringing speech, promising to veto any bill that weakened the present law. All legislatures should be watched.

Sunday Fair Opening. There will never be positive assurance that the act of Congress will not be repealed, so long as any Congress is in session, but practically it is believed there is no danger of open gates. We want now to hear more from the Chicago Sunday Associations about the promised plans for the combined occupation and instruction of visitors who do not feel the need of rest on that day.

Sunday Newspapers. These are an ever-present, tireless, foe, undermining Sabbath sentiment wherever they enter. We are glad two of the state superintendents are to make work against them a speciality, after this week of prayer, beginning the campaign with sermons and circulation of No. 5, "The Sunday Newspaper" and following it up as the way may open.

The Jews and Sunday. Some of the leading synagogues in our large cities are holding regular Sunday services in order to hold their congregations, as the men cannot come on Saturday and the families seldom do. The interesting point is that both in New York and Philadelphia the movement has resulted in a remarkable revival of religion, the audiences have become large, missionary work in the slums and elsewhere is carried on and the Rabbis coöperate with other Christian ministers. God's blessing has rested on the day.

Prayer. All the leading Sabbath societies in the country have united in asking for this week of prayer. Never was it so much needed. Never was Sabbath interests so much imperiled from the laxity of Christian lives and the watchful zeal of Sabbath foes. Let us scatter leaflets, especially at this service, using 19 and 13 against excursions, and work in every way that opens, but above all let us pray without ceasing.

To Our Leaders. We are watched by friendly and unfriendly eyes, and many are grieved when one of our lecturers travels on Sabbath or office work is carried on. Probably some of our numbers think these things right, still we owe it to the National do we not, to publicly support our department and stand by the Sabbath pledge we have recommended; and if we are to have God's continued blessing on our organization, we must ourselves honor His holy day.

PETITION OF THE WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE HOME

Addressed to the Governments of the World.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

NAMES. | RESIDENCES.

We must have one million names this year. Will not men and women, youths and maidens, boys and girls, who love the great cause of home protection, paste this petition on a nice, white sheet of paper and circulate it to the best of their ability, sending the names to Miss Alice E. Briggs, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill.?

EXCELLENT photographs of Miss Jennie Casseday can be procured of Miss Jennie C. Benedict, 1327 Third Ave., Louisville, Ky. The management there is about to make an addition to the Jennie Casseday Free Infirmary for Women, which affords a splendid opportunity for white-ribboners to contribute a memorial or assist the work in some practical way. Address Miss Benedict for particulars.

TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY HARRIET B. KELLS.

(We are saved by hope. Rom. 8: 24.)

The $100 pledges have received the following payments: Pine Bush, N. Y., $100 for a tablet. That is a brave union which sends the full amount in one check, and every worker knows how much is represented in every dollar of it. Garland, Ill., W. C. T. U. sends $2 saying, "We have mite-boxes out and are arranging a Temple entertainment. Our women are enthusiastic about the Temple though we are a rural union." Menominee, Mich., W. C. T. U. forwards $25 on its pledge and North Muskegon, Mich., $13.31; $24 comes from Fall River, Mass., W. C. T. U., $6.35 from Alameda, Cal., union and $6.34 from Clyde, N. Y., W. C. T. U. From W. C. T. U. No. 1, of Washington, Ia., comes $2 for Mrs. Marian H. Dunham's tablet. The W. C. T. U. of Bolivar, Mo., sends $10 for the Ellen D. Morris tablet and the eleventh district, Iowa, W. C. T. U., $10 for the name of Mrs. J. B. Shefler. For the Frances J. Barnes tablet comes $3.65 from the Y of Grand Ledge, Minn.; also $13 from Ethel Stout, Melbourne, Fla., for the Mrs. Trego tablet, and $1 from W. C. T. U. of Le Roy, Kan., for Mrs. Drusilla Wilson. The Wasco, Ore., W. C. T. U. sends $5 for the tablet of Mrs. Anna Riggs, the much-loved state president. The Beaumont, Texas, W. C. T. U. sends $5.25 to be applied on a $100 pledge for a tablet bearing the name of the Texas president, Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard. Of this, $3.65 must be credited to a boy who claims his right to the pictures of our American and British presidents. A year ago he dedicated a dainty little pullet to the Temple. His mother was the custodian of the eggs under the conditions that for her care every pullet hatched should be hers, and the roosters the boy's share. The little hen undoubtedly was a knowing party to the contract for she hatched a large brood, every one of them roosters, and here is the money, to the great joy of the Temple and Master Albert Staton, of Indian Gap, Texas. The rest of the amount, $1.60, is from the mite-box of Master Pling Gerrella, of the same place. Those boys will be governors of Texas some day—for they already know how to succeed—and Prohibition governors, too. God speed the day!

There is no sweeter task than telling what the children do for our House Beautiful or any other cause that endeavors to manifest the holy life of the blessed Jesus, man's highest ideal. Boonville, N. Y., L. T. L. has forwarded $3, the contents of the mite-box of a little eleven years old boy, George Vollmar. He was very ill when the call for mite-boxes was made, but after his death his mother brought his box, for, she said, "he thought more of his Legion than anything else in the world." He was a typical boy, impetuous and mischievous, but with his whole soul a temperance boy; he always remained after the meeting to discuss the work and tidy our room. On his little coat is yet pinned his badge, just as he wore it last; so writes his friend, Lucie A. Rinkle. The L. T. L. of Excelsior, Minn., sends $22.19 on a $100 pledge for a tablet bearing the name of this splendid Legion. Bravo! This is the first tablet preëmpted by the children. Alma Miesler, secretary of Crystal Falls, Mich., L. T. L., sends $5 from Company N, twelfth division. The L. T. L. of Amherst, S. Dak., contributes $5 raised at a Geography social. That is a new and interesting idea for grown folks as well as children to work on. Georgetown, Ky., L. T. L. wants to help build the Temple and sends $5 and an order for another mite-box, saying: "We are so proud of our picture of the Temple and we want the photographs."

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite-box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

THE BEST SYSTEMS OF CHURCH FINANCES, by Rev. Wm. J. Finck, A. M. This leaflet best describes its own mission in these words: "To decide a few of the best systems of church finances, based on the true principles of Scripture." In about ten pages, good suggestions are made for true financiering for the Lord's house, which many churches would do well to adopt rather than some of the methods frequently resorted to.

OUR DAY.

The March Our Day is a very rich number. Phillips Brooks' portrait is the frontispiece. This is a large and highly successful photogravure. Joseph Cook's eulogy of Phillips Brooks, which will be read with keen interest, occupies seventeen pages. The number opens with a full report of answers to numerous questions by the renowned missionary to the New Hebrides, John G. Paton, whom Dr. Storrs calls "the greatest hero of modern times." He discusses Christianity among Cannibals, the Kanaka Labor Trade, and the Rum Traffic in the South Seas.

There is a reprint of Haweis article, "Ghosts and Their Photographs," besides notices of National Divorce Reform, Phillips Brooks' Sermons, Satolli's Mission, Ballot Reform, Rum selling at the World's Fair, and Miss Willard in England.

ECONOMY FOR THE SAKE OF AN EDUCATION.

Better is economy and a good home-made education, than extravagance and its concomitant ignorance.

This proverb is home-made, but it will stand the test of analysis.

Economize with the purpose of educating yourself. You could even stand being called mean for a few years, if that were necessary, but with the plan we suggest to you, no self-sacrifice whatever is necessary, and not even the semblance of meanness entailed. By having in your home that library of libraries, the great Revised Encyclopedia Britannica, the only complete American edition of the unexampled work, the gates of knowledge will be opened to you; and if you apply yourself with system and diligence for a few years, there is not a college-bred man in all the land who can put you to shame.

It pays to be economical.

It pays better when that economy is for the purpose of educating yourself.

It pays best when the means to that self-education is the Revised edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, for that can be brought into your home, and made your ever-ready, ever helpful teacher for TEN CENTS A DAY for only a short period.

Remember our remarkable offer to send the entire 20 volumes on receipt of but one dollar, and giving you 90 days' time at the rate of only 10 cents a day to pay the balance. You can remit the money monthly by draft, check, money order, postal note, or express money order.

Remember also that we send a dime Savings Bank with each order wherein you can deposit the dime each day.

"A WOMAN'S EVANGEL (Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. $1.25), by Eva K. Griffith, will interest and benefit many readers. It has some literary merit, but its special feature is the fact that it is written to explain and advocate the various kinds of effort in behalf of total abstinence which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is making. The many members of, or sympathizers with, that influential organization, will read it with approval, and so will others."

It Isn't "The Same As" and it isn't "as good as," no matter what any grocer may tell you about any imitation of Pearline. He makes more money on it—but do you want to ruin your clothes for his profit? The imitations of Pearline are sold at a lower price, naturally, for they're not as good. Some are dangerous, and would be dear at any price.

There's nothing equal to Pearline, the original washing compound, which saves the most work in washing and cleaning, and doesn't do harm. Pearline is never peddled, and offers no prizes. Every package is a prize in itself.

Beware of imitations. 374 JAMES PYLE, N.Y.

OUR DAY.

The March Our Day is a very rich number. Phillips Brooks' portrait is the frontispiece. This is a large and highly successful photogravure. Joseph Cook's eulogy of Phillips Brooks, which will be read with keen interest, occupies seventeen pages. The number opens with a full report of answers to numerous questions by the renowned missionary to the New Hebrides, John G. Paton, whom Dr. Storrs calls "the greatest hero of modern times." He discusses Christianity among Cannibals, the Kanaka Labor Trade, and the Rum Traffic in the South Seas.

There is a reprint of Haweis article, "Ghosts and Their Photographs," besides notices of National Divorce Reform, Phillips Brooks' Sermons, Satolli's Mission, Ballot Reform, Rum selling at the World's Fair, and Miss Willard in England.

ECONOMY FOR THE SAKE OF AN EDUCATION.

Better is economy and a good home-made education, than extravagance and its concomitant ignorance.

This proverb is home-made, but it will stand the test of analysis.

Economize with the purpose of educating yourself. You could even stand being called mean for a few years, if that were necessary, but with the plan we suggest to you, no self-sacrifice whatever is necessary, and not even the semblance of meanness entailed. By having in your home that library of libraries, the great Revised Encyclopedia Britannica, the only complete American edition of the unexampled work, the gates of knowledge will be opened to you; and if you apply yourself with system and diligence for a few years, there is not a college-bred man in all the land who can put you to shame.

It pays to be economical.

It pays better when that economy is for the purpose of educating yourself.

It pays best when the means to that self-education is the Revised edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, for that can be brought into your home, and made your ever-ready, ever helpful teacher for TEN CENTS A DAY for only a short period.

Remember our remarkable offer to send the entire 20 volumes on receipt of but one dollar, and giving you 90 days' time at the rate of only 10 cents a day to pay the balance. You can remit the money monthly by draft, check, money order, postal note, or express money order.

Remember also that we send a dime Savings Bank with each order wherein you can deposit the dime each day.

THE OAK AND IVY LEAF.

One of the most attractive papers we publish is the Oak and Ivy Leaf, the National organ of the Young Woman's Auxiliary. With a paid-up membership of 17,399, there should be 17,399 subscribers to this paper. The price is kept at the nominal sum of twenty-five cents to enable every member to take a copy. Are you a subscriber? If not, will you not send your own and one new name to

"A WOMAN'S EVANGEL (Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. $1.25), by Eva K. Griffith, will interest and benefit many readers. It has some literary merit, but its special feature is the fact that it is written to explain and advocate the various kinds of effort in behalf of total abstinence which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is making. The many members of, or sympathizers with, that influential organization, will read it with approval, and so will others."

TWO SHIPS—WHICH SHALL LAND?

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions, for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp naming this paper, W. A. NOYES, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

If you have not seen one of the Spring Seed Catalogues issued by F. B. Mills, Seedsman, Rose Hill, N. Y., you should send for one at once; they are free. His seeds are the very best, and prices low. Mr. Mills' Seeds which are so largely advertised, have made him known all over the country, and his Catalogue, which is entirely different from other Seedsmen's, is pleasing to the people. Write for one at once.

It is claimed that what all the world is seeking, a successful treatment of consumption, is being carried on at the Sterlingworth Sanitarium, Lakewood, N. Y., an illustration of which will be found elsewhere in our columns. The Institution publishes no circulars, but gives the results of the treatment, showing that they are curing consumption, although they do not claim to cure all victims of the disease. Their original claim that climatic influence is not necessary, for a cure will attract many who are banished to Colorado or similar climates in order to prolong life. The company invite the closest scrutiny, and will send abstract of cases already treated, and furnish all the references asked in regard to patients who have already been cured.

CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

Write to John J. Byrne, Asst. Passenger Traffic Manager, 723 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., if you are interested in California, and he will send you some reading matter.

A Word with the Young Ladies

IT is said that over 40 per cent. of the young ladies who graduate from the great female seminary at Vassar are married within the next two years after coming home. There must be a reason for this. It is this: The young, brainy business man, the middle-aged merchant, or college graduate, wants a helpmate through life. What woman is so well fitted to assist her husband as the one with a good education?

It is not possible for you all to go to Vassar, but it is very easy for you to acquire at home all the knowledge taught there at a nominal figure. A seminary education costs several hundred dollars a year. You can fully equip yourself for all the duties of life to be a helpmate to your husband, father or brother by taking advantage of the opportunity which we offer you to secure a set of the REVISED ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA. And you can do all this for 10 cents a day.

In your lifetime, it is doubtful if you will ever meet with such an opportunity again. Everything pertaining to the arts and sciences, history, biography, invention, etc., are here treated in so comprehensive a manner as to make them at once your own. Seeing is believing. One Dollar will secure you a set at once.

ONLY 10 CENTS A DAY IS REQUIRED.

On receipt of only One Dollar we will forward to you, charges prepaid, the entire set of TWENTY volumes, the remaining $9.00 to be paid at the rate of 10 cents a day (to be remitted monthly). A beautiful dime savings bank will be sent with the books, in which the dime may be deposited each day. This edition is printed from new, large type on a fine quality of paper, and is strongly bound in heavy manilla paper covers, which with proper care will last for years. Bear in mind that the entire 20 volumes are delivered to your address, with all charges paid to any part of the United States.

CUT THIS OUT AND SEND TO THE UNION SIGNAL.

PUBLISHERS UNION SIGNAL:

Please deliver to me the entire set of 20 volumes of Revised Encyclopedia Britannica, as above described, together with your Dime Savings Bank, for which I inclose One Dollar, and further agree to remit 10 cents a day (remitting the same monthly) until the remaining $9.00 is fully paid.

Signal Notes.

JOHN BURNS, M. P., recently gave out that the number of unemployed in England would exceed one million two hundred and fifty thousand.

THE famous Queen Christina of Sweden, delighted in the fact that when a baby, instead of betraying fear, she would clap her hands when she heard the firing of guns. She studied and read deeply and was penetrated by a sense of the high mission to which she was called.

AN Indian missionary puts the difference between the anti and pro-opium contestants in a nutshell. "Cost what it may in money, England must act righteously," and "Cost what it may in morals, India must have revenue." The same holds good in the great temperance crusade.

A THOROUGHLY practical way of "lending a hand" is adopted by the boys of a large school in the east. Land is to be purchased near the White Mountains, buildings erected and every summer twenty-four poor boys from the cities will be taken there for a few weeks' outing. The giving of such pleasure will do much for the school-boys in character building.

THE annual meeting of the English Band of Hope workers was held recently in Exeter Hall, London. The reports were most encouraging. The number of juvenile societies connected with the union was eight thousand four hundred and fifteen, with an average membership of one hundred and sixty-five per society, giving a total of 1,388,475 young people under the influence of the union, while there are probably about four hundred and fifty thousand not connected.

AN Englishman writing in defense of the public house and his glass of ale, unwittingly gives the reason why the public house flourishes. He says that he likes the pleasant conversation and society of friends and that he and his friends are greatly amused at the sincere but mistaken opinions of certain gentlemen who think that opening of museums and similar places will lessen the drinking, for those who enjoy the public house are not the persons who enjoy the museums.

THE condition of the inmates of workhouses in England is attracting considerable attention, particularly the treatment of old women. There are but one hundred and thirty-six women on the six hundred and forty-eight boards of guardians, and it is proposed as a remedy for existing evils that every board have from three to four capable women on it and that the post of matron be given to a woman of refinement and education.

MR. KEIR HARDY, M. P., the great labor leader, is wont to preach on Sunday night in London. He is a Congregationalist, and in the course of a recent sermon on the Good Samaritan he said, "Every day forty-three thousand children in London go breakfastless to school, and are they not our neighbors? What do we do about it? Do we recognize the relationship? The unfortunate women who walk the streets of our great towns and the men who tramp the byways and highways, are they not our neighbors, too? What are we doing about them? It is not enough to dispense charity to these suffering ones as a remedy for the admitted injustice under which they suffered. The church must not merely dispense charity, but she must teach people that the system which enriches the few at the cost of moral and material well-being of the many, is essentially unchristian. For ourselves we take the position that while, as the Bible says, 'if a man will not work neither shall he eat,' the converse is equally true, if a man is willing to work it is the duty of his fellow-men to see that he has something to eat, and until we come to this basis our Christianity needs quickening."

Honest Medical Advice.

It is worth a great deal to a sick person to get an honest medical opinion. It is not always easy to do this, but there is a way in which such may be obtained, and that without any cost whatever. Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, the discoverers and sole dispensers of that remarkable medical agent, Compound Oxygen, have never, during the twenty-three years of their wide practice, charged anything for consultation. If the sufferer from Consumption, Catarrh, Asthma, Dyspepsia, Nervous Prostration, or other serious chronic diseases, will write them a clear statement of his case, he will promptly receive an honest medical opinion, giving him chances of relief. He will also be welcome to a copy of the history of the discovery of Compound Oxygen, together with a large record of cases treated successfully. Among these may be found some exactly similar to your own. DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

A Cultivated Taste

would naturally lead a person possessing it to prefer the best things obtainable and guard against imperfections. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is unequalled in quality, as a trial will prove. Grocers and Druggists.

Desiring to give the admirers of Ivory Soap an opportunity to contribute to its literature, the manufacturers offered prizes for the best twelve verses suitable for use as advertisements, 27,388 contributions were received. To the following was awarded the

THIRD PRIZE.

William Henry Kellow was a very clever fellow,
Who hired a house on the suburban plan,
And mornings when he started, and city-ward departed,
The household needs in this wise often ran:

"Now get a fancy waiter, and a nut-meg grater,
And for Susie buy a jumping rope;
Bring a coffee boiler, some muffin-pans and broiler,
And don't come back without some Ivory Soap."

Said William with decision, though partly in derision,
"I'll endeavor with this pack-horse act to cope,
One item less I'll carry, and no longer tarry,
I'll go and buy a box of Ivory Soap."

Now he rides serenely, enjoys life's pleasures keenly,
No longer undertakes to fret and mope,
The list's abbreviated, no more he is berated
For forgetting to bring back some Ivory Soap.

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U., sending the same through the authorized channels to the treasurer of her nation, asking her to send it to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

A local option convention met in Pittsburg, March 14 and 15.

The usual spring floods caused by rain and ice gorges have created devastation in many parts of the country the past week.

President Cleveland sent a message to the Senate, March 9, requesting a return of the Hawaiian treaty, which was immediately granted.

During an attempt to repeal the anti-gambling law, disgraceful scenes were enacted in the Oklahoma legislature which closed Saturday.

A disastrous conflagration, causing a loss of many lives and four and a half million dollars' worth of property occurred in Boston, March 10.

The first meeting of the state senate convention to investigate the whisky trust in Illinois was held in the Sherman House, Chicago, March 10.

Rev. Dr. A. P. Peabody, for fifty years associated with the faculty of Harvard College, and a former editor of the North American Review, died at Boston, March 10, aged seventy-six years.

The committee of the Reichstag at Berlin, March 10, rejected the first two clauses of the long debated army bill and the prospect is that further action will be deferred until autumn.

The Panama congressional investigating committee reports that three great banking firms in New York City received each $400,000 for use of their names to give confidence to the enterprise.

A resolution was passed in the Illinois senate, Friday, to institute suits against ex-state treasurers and auditors, who, in violation of the constitution, have taken for their own use, fees and other perquisites.

A house bill, providing for the establishment of kindergartens, in connection with common schools in Illinois, at the option of the local board of education, was referred to the senate committee on education last week.

During the Panama canal trials in Paris, March 9, M. Baihaut, a member of the French cabinet, confessed his guilt in receiving bribes. Startling revelations have been made by Charles de Lesseps and others, and much excitement prevails.

IN a published document recently sent out, there was an error about Miss Willard's financial relations to THE UNION SIGNAL. From the date of her editorship, January '92, to the present time, Miss Willard has not received one cent of salary, and the total amount assigned her for clerical help has been only three hundred and sixty dollars.

KANSAS CITY, the county seat of Wyandotte county, Kansas, is, through the efforts of the county equal suffragists, the scene of a unique political canvas this spring. A woman has been nominated for mayor and regardless of partisanship or color, every woman in the city is being urged to register and vote, according to the law of the state which gives women a voice in municipal affairs. Such a well-organized effort for good government in deserving of success.

Now that the question of Sunday closing of the Columbian Exposition gates is assured, jubilant friends should rally to the interests of the wage-earners and insist upon employers granting frequent holidays to their employés, for attendance upon the Exposition. The commission should also be petitioned for reduced entrance fees.

THE memorial sent to Congress by the Denver Convention, petitioning for further and more stringent restriction of immigration, was presented in both Houses by the chairman of the committee of immigration. Each of these gentlemen wrote to Mrs. S. F. Grubb, who prepared the memorial, a commendatory letter. The document has been referred to the committee on immigration.

A SHORT time ago the public press stated that a bill for legalizing lynching had been introduced into the Texas legislature. The president of Texas W. C. T. U., Mrs. Stoddard, writes us that this is a mistake and that the bill was one to make the county in which lynching took place liable to heirs not less than three thousand dollars, and that the parties interested may recover a sum of not less than five thousand dollars from each participant of the wrong.

ITHACA, N. Y., the seat of Cornell College, we are glad to see, is engaging in a stirring campaign for no-license this spring, stimulated thereto by the beneficent results at Cambridge, Mass., the home of Harvard College. The Plain Truth, a sturdy little campaign sheet, gives the facts and urges the citizens of Ithaca to vote for an anti-saloon mayor. An appeal from the ministers to the citizens, pointing out the dangers of the saloon "in the midst," and asking for its overthrow, was recently issued. We, in common with other Christian temperance workers, will watch with interest the outcome of this determined effort.

ON the reverse of a prohibition city ticket to be voted for in St. Louis, April 4, we find four scintillating principles pledged by the Prohibitionists of that city, should their representatives be elected to power. First, to uphold constitutional prohibition as the only remedy for the evils caused by the liquor traffic. Second, to enforce the restrictive or prohibitory features of the present law. Third, to see that the business of the city is honestly and diligently conducted. Fourth, to adopt civil service rules for official incumbents. On perusal we are moved to ask, Is there any other party who would make, and faithfully keep, such vital promises?

WHITE ribboners have long been accustomed to unite with the Prayer Union in its observance of the first week in April as a season of prayer for the observance of the Sabbath in all lands. The call for this observance reads, "The past has been an eventful year for the Sabbath cause in America, the present promises to be immeasurably more so, and it may be the crucial year in our beloved land. We therefore invite all pastors and all Christians to observe the week, April 2–9, for special prayer, public and private, for the imperilled Sabbath in this and all lands and for special effort in its behalf, and collections for the spread of literature. In devout gratitude let us unitedly praise God for the aroused interest in the preservation of the Lord's Day, for the forty millions represented on the petitions for Sunday closing of the World's Fair, for the decisive vote of Congress closing the gates, and the failure of efforts for repeal of that action. It is a triumph, the influence of which will be perpetual. While we are greatly joyful over the way the Lord has led us, yet in view of the great peril that still gathers around our Christian institutions and especially our Sabbath, we feel constrained, for the sake of home, religion, the cause of labor and the world's conversion, to ask all pastors, that during the first week of April next they use the services of the sanctuary, by sermons and prayer-meetings, to deepen the intelligent conviction of the people on the broad and practical lines of Christian law and living."

AN excellent idea has materialized from the press of the National Prohibition Bureau, to wit, a page of first-class temperance and prohibition matter for the use of W. C. T. Unions in local newspapers. This page consists of six columns in plate form, all ready to go on the press at a cost of only twenty-five cents a column. Each one of these plate forms is accompanied by a proof, which can be carefully read not only by the press superintendent, but by the editor of the paper, who will thus be assured that nothing objectionable will appear. The columns are twenty inches long, but can be cut to any desired length. The difficult work of the press superintendent in furnishing the proper material is thus obviated, and all expense and trouble to the editors removed. For further information address Mr. Tallie Morgan, 10 East 14th St., New York City.

MRS. Ole BULL, National superintendent of sanitary and economic cooking, is contributing to THE UNION SIGNAL a valuable series of articles on "Scientific Nutrition in Cookery," the second appearing in this issue. There is no more urgent need in the American home than knowledge in this line, for though Americans lavish expense upon the table, they are not a well-fed people. "Every man hath lain upon his own trenches," is a physical axiom uttered by the ancient Saxon with a truer vision than he knew, and in these later days demonstrated by the unerring finger of science. If Mrs. Ole Bull's philanthropic thought for the American table be studied in proportion to the need, the result will be not only better food and more perfect bodies, but truer brains, wiser hearts—a people better fitted to grapple with the great problems which are making for the present day.

THE women's temperance work in England is passing through the same crisis and transition that is enshrined in the heroic history of the W. C. T. U. in America. To broaden its basis and classify its work was the purpose of Mrs. Bright Lucas, its former president, but advanced age and ill health rendered it impossible for her to cope with the conservatism of the executive committee. Lady Henry Somerset is now steadily endeavoring to accomplish the same great task, in which there is every reason to believe that the members of the British Women's Temperance Association, of which she has been president for nearly three years, are with her in sympathy and purpose. The executive committee of the Scottish women's union has unanimously agreed to stand by the progressive policy of Lady Henry Somerset, and various conferences and conclusions of the British auxiliaries indicate that a strong majority hold the same views.

MRS. CARSE has returned to Chicago from California, considerably improved in health. A few weeks more would have completed her recuperation, but she was not willing to let the unjust charges of Mr. Hobbs remain longer unanswered, particularly as she had learned that his interview had been scattered far and wide by a hostile and well-concerted plan. Mrs. Carse will at once prepare an answer to every one of Mr. Hobbs' charges, at the same time setting forth the exact financial condition of the Temple and her relations to it. This may be expected soon. In the meantime, friends of the Temple and Mrs. Carse are rallying around her most loyally. Letters of sympathy and confidence are literally "pouring in." Here is a brief extract from one: "Great trouble seems to have been taken to distribute Mrs. Hobbs' collection of misgivings and advice to the W. C. T. U., but we believe the faithful women of the unions will not have their confidence shaken, and that good will come of it all." Here is another: "'The king of shadows loves a shining mark'—in more respects than one, and so not being able to stop your good work, he has moved an attack under cover. This attack puts you into the honorable list in Hebrews 11. God has better ways for Christians to 'help' each other and a struggling cause than to arouse suspicion before its enemies."

CALUMNY.

A Legend.

BY MARIA BARRETT BUTLER.

In ancient time a peerless column reared
Its white strength grandly toward the bending blue,
While polished ledges zoned its surface round,
And cycled thus the decades of its height.
As pure as carven light those circling ruins,
And—whether furred with winter's softest snows,
Or bright with pendant spears of glinting ice,
Or wooing dalliance of the summer birds—
They seemed to clasp in trust some garnered strength.
About its base the kindly mother-earth
(That fosters in the largess of her heart Alike the granite and the flowering germ)
Thrust forth her grasses, ferns and healing herbs
To nestle close, and modest kinship claim
With this majestic presence in their midst.
Its light reflected, warmed them into life,
Its trickling moistures fed their thirsting hearts,
Its ample breast absorbed the sharpest frosts,
Its tribute all—from sun or cloud or dew,
Was shared with these the humblest of their kind.
Oft times the weary traveler gone astray,
With sun beclouded and with soul perplexed,
Had but to raise his eyes, when lo! at once
Knew he his bearings; and with quickened pace,
His straying feet were turned toward Rest and Home
The alchemist, that o'er his crucibles
Was haggard grown with never-ending search
Of golden secret, which when just attained,
Eluded ever, ever luring on;—
The gaunt-eyed student, worn with tracing back,
In fruitless search, all things, including self,
To blank nonenity, with God left out;—
The man in foreign traffic, weary grown
Of ships with spices laden, ores and gems;—
O'er burdened women, sad with cares and change,
Drawn ever toward the types of stable strength;—
Light-hearted maidens, deeming life all bliss,
Whose lovers pledged their fealty should last,
While e'er the mighty column held its place;—
The prince and bondman, all—all came and went,
And found it restful but to gaze thereon.
Some few there were who treasured in their souls
The secret of a room within its heart,
Well swept and garnished, where unknown to men,
The lord of all the realm, in lowly guise,
Oft times did knock and enter in and sup.
But came a time, alas! a woeful time,
When skies grew dark and winds were whispering sprites
That, hissing, pierced unwilling ears with dread,
Or changed anon to doleful wails, or shrieked
Demoniac laughter with a grim "Aha!"
And charged the air with vague portent of ill.
Good men and wise spoke softly and confessed
To sense of coming ill, they knew not what.
Then came a hush—a treacherous lull, wherein Vindictive forces gathered baleful strength
For one great throe that all the earth should quake.
Good men and wise felt firm foundations shake,
And looked aloft for strength to steadfast stand
Until the din and dust and roar should pass.
All eyes then turned to scan the columns length,
To learn if that, perchance, were still unscathed;
But many eyes, alas! alas! were blurred
By blinding dust, henceforth beyond repair,
Yet wot they not, but ever cried, "I see!"—
The while they pointed where a darkened spot
In grim outline the topmost cycle dimmed,
Revealing clear the marble's blackened heart,
With ugly fissures reaching far below,
And threatening—these averred—its early doom,
And warned their friends, and held themselves aloof.
Lest toppling over, all beneath were crushed!
Good men and wise with clearer vision saw,
And doubted not that Time, in righting wrongs,
Would put away the plague-spot from their sight,
And leave intact the marble's purity;
For what of earth could evermore stand fast,
If this were shattered by its first great shock!
Meanwhile were many yet who thought the Lord
Of all the realm still came as was His wont,
And entered in by secret door to sup.
The heavens, in pitying grief, with one accord,
Sent purifying rains and searching winds
That oft times softened to Æolian strains,
As though they knew the Lord had passed within.
The very stars, the while, winked pitying tears,
The sun burned fiercely hot his bleaching rays,
Until one morn good men and wise arose,
And looked as ever toward their country's pride,
And saw it fair and pure in God's own light.
Then wending each his way they sought its base,
Where in its filth a putrid vulture lay—
A mammoth thing—that, glutted to the death
On carrion food, had sought brave perch to die,
And, crouched in shapeless mass, had slowly oozed
Its foulness day by day in noisome trails,
Which blear-eyed people, with distempered souls,
Had fissures deemed! and then exclaimed, "Aha!"–
And these, still gazing upward, feigned to see
The same defacing lines; nor recked that still
The Royal Presence deigned to sup within;
The while Æolian airs the sweeter blew,
And all the earth, and air, and sky, and stars,
Seemed singing one refrain of "Peace, be still."
And thus the legend standeth to this day.

HIS DELEGATE.

BY "SELA."

The great door closed behind them with a dull, heavy thud, and outside the frowning walls they stood, five weary workers, looking into each other's faces with a sort of despairing helplessness.

"Abandon hope all ye who enter here!" There was a queer little break in Mrs. Gray's voice, which might have meant a laugh, but which bore close kinship to a sob.

"We might as well adopt that as our motto!" exclaimed another member of the group as she ruefully examined the bruises on her pretty hands. "I'm completely discouraged, and I move now that we write that over the door and retire."

"A disgrace to our white ribbons and ourselves!" a scornful voice concluded the sentence. "Why, that's rank treason, Miss Daniels!"

"I don't dare give up," and the speaker's gray eyes filled with tears, "it may mean so much to me."

They all understood, for since the new law firm of "Morrison and Mathews," Mrs. Mathews' sweet young face had wore an anxious look. Small wonder that it was so, for Sydney Morrison's keen wit and brilliant intellect were an easy snare to most men; and Hal Mathews was rapidly developing under his able tuition the same careless regard for all things good and true, the same half-laughing, half-scornful derision of humanity's nobler deeds, while he was tasting from the cup held out so enticingly to him, the wine of worldly, godless pleasure.

There was eloquent silence after the low voice ceased, and an arm stole round the owner of the gray eyes; then Mrs. Davenport, their gracious president, stooped down and kissed the sad face. " 'Fear not, neither be dismayed,' my child. Remember, 'I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.' "

The helpful words fell like a blessing over the troubled group, and they went their several ways, the burden a little lifted.

Mrs. Mathews repeated the words over and over again, as she walked slowly towards her husband's office, and so absorbed was she, that she did not see the tall young fellow who stood at the foot of the stairs, watching her with an amused smile. He laid his hand on her arm.

"Well, little woman, are you carrying all the woes of this old world on your tender heart?"

The cheery voice, the arresting hand, brought her quickly out of revery, and there was joy unspeakable as her swift glance saw that all was well with him whom her soul loved. Alas, that it was not always so!

"You poor, tired girl! Been up at that confounded old hall all morning, I'll warrant! Well, I'll be glad when this temperance business is over; I ought to have kept you out of it." He threw open the office door. "There, sit down in that easy chair and take a good rest before we start for home. Morrison's out," as he noticed her furtive glance toward the inner room. "Have some grapes? Let me take off your jacket. There! now tell me what made you come down the street with such a dole ful countenance?"

It was nice to be taken care of and fussed over as in the old halcyon days, and after she had enjoyed it to her heart's content, and given unutterable thanks for the unclouded intellect before her, the little wife poured out her troubles.

"There is so much to be done to get ready for the convention and so few to do it! To think that they must hold their meetings in that dismal old hall! And oh, how hard the few have worked to brighten up the dingy walls—and no one seems to care anything about it, since they learned that Miss Willard is not coming—and the very worst of all, there are so few homes open to receive the delegates. It is just dreadful and what can we do? We have even gone from house to house, only to meet with cool, polite refusals! Only two days more, and there are yet quite a number of delegates unprovided for. Oh, why are people so careless, so thoughtless about the King's business! What will they say to Him when He comes for His reckoning?"

The eloquent gray eyes were uplifted only to encounter the cool, laughing countenance of the man she so disliked and distrusted. Her face flushed hotly; she would not have been so enthusiastic had she known the inner office was tenanted.

"I beg pardon, Mrs. Mathews, for playing eavesdropper, but your own eloquence is my best excuse. 'Almost thou persuadest me'—not to belong to the mystic circle, but to open my heart to your poor, homeless, illy-treated delegates. By the way, Mrs. Mathews," he came into the room hat in hand, "why don't you try a pull at our purse-strings; homes, we poor bachelors have none, but we might prove more hospitable than the gentler sex. I'll tell you what! I'll take a delegate, Mrs. Mathews. Oh, I'm in earnest! I'll have her entertained at the Aldine, and"—a little mocking tone crept into his rich voice, "she need never know of her indebtedness to the 'world, the flesh and the devil.' Come, Mrs. Mathews, what do you say? Can you trust one of your lambs to me?"

Had the skies fallen, certainly she would not have been more surprised. He enjoyed her face intensely for a few seconds, then said quietly:

"I see you haven't the heart to refuse my aid. Then we'll consider it settled. Now, Mathews, take this wife of yours home and see that she has a rest. I'll hunt up some of the other fellows, and guarantee now that your delegates will all be entertained." And so it came about, that nine days' wonder, "Sydney Morrison's queer freak."

Two days later, as he took his place at the table d'hôte he saw opposite him a thin, rather severe visaged woman who glanced up indifferently as he sat down. He noticed that she wore a bit of white-ribbon in her button-hole.

"My delegate, I presume," and he shrugged his shoulders while an amused smile stole round his mouth. "They evidently 'picked' her with a tender regard for my susceptible heart." He watched her a little curiously as she gave her orders to a waiter. Yes, she was just about what he had expected! Why were all the presumably good, philanthropic women so woefully, yes, frightfully unattractive? Were they driven into such work by reason of this very homeliness and utter absence of those tender little graces which crown the womanly woman? Or was it that the work itself made them sour-faced, grim, like the woman before him, who was too deeply absorbed in her meal to give even a kindly glance round the table? He thought over all the pretty, agreeable women of his acquaintance. Not one had a thought of this sort of thing. Not one save Mrs. Mathews, and his conscience told him why she had put her heart into it. Bah! that woman before him somehow irritated him, offended his fastidious self, and an unreasoning anger against the temperance women filled his heart. Jove, what an appetite she had! And she went to work with a will to satisfy it, too! He snatched up his morning paper to hide the unconscious offender from view, and read: "Delegates arriving! Convention opens at noon! Stirring reports! Interesting and eloquent speakers! Cheering and helpful words!"

Breakfast was before him and he laid down his paper screen. Now, what possible help could those thin lips offer to—well to such as he? But there! What difference could it make to him whom they sent him! It was late, and he finished his breakfast as rapidly as possible and hastily left the room, so hastily that he was guilty of rudely brushing against a lady who was just entering, causing her to drop both gloves and paper from her hands. He stooped quickly, picked up the articles, and as he handed them to their owner with a courteous little apology, he looked into a pair of violet eyes, and became conscious that the quiet "Thank you," came from youthful lips.

The faint perfume of violets seemed to linger about him all the day, even in the dingy, old court room, and he wondered a little in the midst of an important case, if his morning's vision would appear to him a second time. Ah, his fates were propitious! His quick glance down the long dining-room told him that in the very place his "delegate" had occupied earlier, she of the violet eyes sat. Of course he was outwardly oblivious of her presence, and calmly ate his dinner, but his heart beat a trifle faster as the fragrance of the violets in her gown stole deliciously over him. Who could she be! Was she alone! He must take one look—it was not in human nature to resist—and as he did so he encountered the lovely clear eyes, and in them was something like a gleam of interest, as if she had been studying him. It was but a second, then she looked gravely down at her plate, and he did not flatter himself there would be another glance; she was not that kind—and there suddenly swept over him a wave of contempt for those young women with whom he had laughed, and flirted, and frittered away his time; a great desire came upon him to know this girl whose eyes met his fearlessly, and whose mouth was firm and strong, yet so sweet and tender. That she was every inch a lady, from the tip of her stylish turban to the soles of her trim walking boots, his keen eyes had told him at first glance, so he wondered and wondered. Mathews found him a couple of hours later in the office, lost in wonder so profound that he gave a tremendous start when Hal laid his hand on his shoulder.

"The deuce!" he exclaimed testily. "What do you mean by stealing up on a man in such a way!" then he felt ashamed, especially as he saw Mrs. Mathews in the doorway. He jumped up quickly: "Won't you come in, Mrs. Mathews? My bad temper is gone. What's up that makes you two look so festive?" noting Mrs. Mathews' pretty evening hat and Hal's extreme look of freshness.

The latter answered rather sheepishly, "Oh, I promised Jessie I would take her to the temperance meeting at the hall, you know;" and if he had promised to escort her to the most questionable entertainment he could not have appeared more shamefaced.

Morrison's expressive eyes laughed, but the rest of his face was grave enough. "I wish you a pleasant evening, old fellow, and I think from what I have seen, you will enjoy it. Have you the pleasure of knowing my delegate, Mrs. Mathews?"

Jessie Mathews' sweet disposition was constantly "riled" by this man, and the covert sneer in his voice made her answer sharply:

"I do not know whom the ladies assigned to the Aldine, Mr. Morrison, but I do know that every delegate is a woman I should be proud and pleased to know."

He said nothing, only bowed gravely, and watched Hal get his stick from the corner. Mrs. Mathews looked back,—the solitary figure by the table touched her. What grand possibilities lay within that man's grasp! In spite of her dislike she could not but admit the wonderful power and nameless fascination that seemed to hover about him. Was he not worth saving? Could she—dared she? It would spoil her evening. Then she slipped her hand from her husband's arm and went straight back to the man she so feared.

"Mr. Morrison, will you not come with us this evening?"

Her cheeks grew crimson under his keen gaze, but there was no doubt of her earnestness, and Morrison, to Hal's utter amazement, deliberately closed his book and said:

"Thank you, Mrs. Mathews, I will!"

There were a few curious glances bestowed on him as he entered the great hall, but he was comparatively unnoticed in his seat, and looked around with rather quizzing eyes. Why, how prettily they had fixed up the bleak old walls! What harmonious blending of colors! How sweet the lilies were! "For God and Home and Native Land!"—that must be their motto. It had taken many hours of hard work to frame all those letters in their white purity—and so his thoughts wandered around the room until he awoke to the consciousness that some one was talking, and he looked rather curiously toward the stage. A very pleasant, ordinary appearing woman was telling some very ordinary truths in a very ordinary manner, and his thoughts wandered again, this time to an important case which was to come up soon; and Mrs. Mathews sighed as she saw his pre-occupation. "He didn't hear a word! There hadn't been a particle of good in bringing him! And Hal would see and catch his indifference!" and poor Mrs. Mathews worried and fretted while the Lord was working in His own sure way.

The cessation of the speaker's voice and the movement about him, brought his eyes and mind back to the present—both on the alert to make merry over all incongruities. But he saw only a beautifully decorated hall, fragrant flowers, fresh-faced, rosy-cheeked girls flitting about as ushers, going on errands; and on the stage, each side the desk, sat a group of women, dignified, earnest of purpose, listening intently to one of their number, their faces now lighting up with enthusiasm, now shadowed with feeling. Somehow it aroused him and in spite of himself he began to be interested. Why, these were all refined, cultured, lady-like women! The richness and pathos of the speaker's voice quite charmed him. He looked in vain for his delegate—and smiled a little bitterly as he thought of her—there were none on the platform quite like the one they had sent him. He heard Hal's muffled exclamation, he saw Mrs. Hal lean forward with a wonderfully surprised look, then he, too, was gazing straight ahead, with wide-awake eyes. She came out from among the lilies, all in white, the violets in her silver girdle just matching her eyes. Quietly she stood before them, her hands clasped lightly in front, while the organist touched a few soft chords, then in the deep hush her voice rose clear and full, melted and died away. Oh, the tenderness, the sweetness, the indescribable pleading! There was no other sound in the great hall.

"Oh, wonderful words of the Gospel, Oh, wonderful message they bring,"

and then:

"Believe and receive the redemption
He offers to you and to me."

Only a simple gospel hymn, and yet—who could ever forget

"There's no other refuge but Jesus,
No shelter where lost ones may fly,
And now, while he's tenderly calling,
O turn ye, for why will ye die?"

She had brought her message to them, and to him, and as quietly as she had come she left them, disappearing behind the tall lilies to whom she seemed akin.

Of the rest of the program Morrison heard not a word; he could not shut out from his remembrance that glorious voice and its pleading. And she was one of that despised sisterhood; he recollected now that the violets had been tied with a dainty white ribbon. A mighty disgust of himself and his hollow, empty life rose within him. What a chasm there was between him and her! But they were rising to receive the benediction and, mechanically, he rose, too. In the same absent manner he found himself shaking hands with Mrs. Davenport, the wide-awake W. C. T. U. president, and with a mighty effort pulled his scattered wits together to hear her say:

"In the name of the society I want to thank you for your generosity, Mr. Morrison, and for your timely aid. We did not expect such royal entertainment as you have placed at our disposal, but we think you have found your reward in the delegate we sent you." She smiled archly, then said frankly, "It was one of our secretary's blunders which so favored you, but I see no reason to remove her, as she is accompanied by her faithful, argus-eyed old nurse, who certainly does not invite approach, does she?" then more gravely: "Isn't it grand that she, so young, so beautiful, has consecrated her voice entirely to the service of our King? It makes me ashamed of my small services. Thank you again, Mr. Morrison."

He turned away with a courteous inclination of his head; and suddenly she laid her hand on his arm.

Mr. Morrison, I wish—I wish with all my heart that I could make you acquainted with Miss Carlyle, but I cannot, I dare not. Oh, my friend, that it should be so!" and her eyes were full of tears.

Strangely affected, he scarcely heeded Mathews' apology as he and his wife abruptly left him, but followed the crowd out of the hall, nor paused until he reached his own room.

THE UNION OF REFORMS.

BY MARY A. BROWNE.

Probably no articles in recent numbers of THE UNION SIGNAL have been more earnestly discussed than those bearing on the union of the three great questions of labor, prohibition of the liquor traffic and self-government for women.

The broad-minded reformer in either line sees in the very suggestion of a union of reforms an impetus to his own work. It is an acknowledgement on the part of each of the three reforms that the others are great and needed. This in itself shows a forward step. Already valuable time has been lost while these reforms, like the disciples of Christ in other days, have disputed among themselves which should be greatest. But now the hour seems nearer when the voice of the Master rebukes these foolish disputes and holds in His arms the little child—the embryo of the next generation—for whom all reforms exist. He tells those near Him: "Whoso receiveth one such little child receiveth me." Thus all reformers receiving the Great Reformer, work for the good of those who follow, and become one in spirit and in deed.

The suggestions which have been given for conventions of reformers are good, though probably the first benefit would be only the tie of intimate acquaintance among leaders. It was fully demonstrated a year ago at St. Louis that union would not begin in a convention. It must first be accomplished in the great-heart chieftains of the clans. There it must be "permanent and perpetual," a living fire of enthusiasm; and though voice ring clearer or pen move more swiftly in one of this blessed trinity of reforms than another, let none be so absorbed in the one that the ready ear, the unprejudiced soul and the prompt alliance be found unready for the call of judgment.

Many persons, in reference to these three questions, confess an inability to decide which is paramount. Radical on the point of individual freedom it is natural to women to say that woman's ballot is the greatest need of the hour, because it would bring all other reforms. An enthusiast in the temperance reform, since the days when their hearts burned within them hearing how the Master had spoken to the women of Hillsboro to go forward, it is not possible, perhaps, that the W. C. T. U. should think any need greater than the destruction of the rum power. But to one who looks daily from the window on men, who in this bitter winter have been discharged from one railroad, and are tramping half across a state in the vain hope of remunerative employment at another point, the greatest need seems to be profitable work for every voter, so that with a home and home life he may be reached by the moral suasion necessary to make him give the "legal suasion" which will exterminate alcohol.

So in every thought, and every wish for the good of the race these reforms intertwine; they are united. Let reformers recognize this fact. Then when they gather in convention there will be no useless bickering or hidden jealousy as to which is greater or which shall have precedence. The reforms are united, let the reformers clasp hands and realize that an obstruction to one is the postponement of all, and together only can come to the birthright.

To secure this union of reformers the first step, perhaps, is a convention of representatives of the reform press, making definite arrangements to give each reform a fair amount of space in every paper. With editors ready to truly represent, why may not these reforms unite to walk in "the way of all truth"?

SCIENTIFIC NUTRITION IN COOKERY.

BY SARA C. BULL.

II.

This article is based principally upon the writings, often quoted verbatim, of Mrs. Hinman Abel and Mr. Mathieu Williams.* The compact form in which this must be given permits us to touch upon essentials only, and the rationale must be sought, if desired more fully, in the books treating these subjects.

A few words of further explanation, as given by Mrs. Abel concerning food principles, will help us to bear in mind what we are to attempt to do in our practical work. The oxygen we breathe and the water we drink—bodies full grown are two-thirds composed of water, and food contains from one to ninety-four per cent of it—are furnished directly by nature, and the former should, especially for children, be thought of as a food.

Foodstuffs are divided into proteids (gluten of flour, albumen of white of egg and blood serum; fibrin of blood, casein of milk, etc.), fats (all vegetable and animal fatty matters and oils); carbohydrates (starch, dextrine and sugar).

Of these proteids only contain nitrogen and are the essential foodstuffs; the carbohydrates and fats are force giving, heat producing and fattening. The minerals necessary are contained in any ordinary diet. Although proteid matter is an essential element of food and under certain conditions may suffice to maintain the body, it is a very disadvantageous and uneconomical food uncombined, since it contains too much of nitrogen in proportion to the carbon needed. The latter can be readily supplied by the fats and carbohydrates.

Unproductive labor is as much to be avoided in physical as in political economy.—(Huxley). Thus we learn that we must have the essential and accessory foodstuffs combined in the right proportion, in the right quantity and in an available, that is, a digestible form, if the body of the healthy man or woman is not to be depraved and crippled in one or another form.

It is also to be remembered that fruits, fresh vegetables, salads, etc., contain in their acids, phosphates and flavoring properties, much that is not only desirable, we almost might say essential to many, although not prominently placed in the food tables except in the dried form.

The proteid in vegetables ranges in cost from eight to thirty-four cents a pound, and from eighteen cents to a little over one dollar in ordinary animal foods—meats, fish, milk, eggs, etc.—while in some it is much higher. The reason for this higher cost is, of course, simple enough. Animal foods are made from vegetable, and by a more or less expensive process. The manufacture of beef or milk from grass and grain involves considerable outlay for labor and incidental expenses, and the product is, of course, much less in quantity than the raw material.

The mixed diet, animal and vegetable foods common to this country, according to the best authorities forming the standard dietary tables, calls for from 2 1-12 to 2½ pounds in food per diem for children and delicate women; 2½ to 2¾ pounds for more vigorous women and sedentary men. The American standard (highest of all) for men at hard work calls for from 3½ to 4 pounds per diem. Allowing for loss in digestion, the quantity and the proportion of food elements should be in an average daily allowance of the mixed diet,

PROTEIDS.

This whole class is sometimes called albumens. The

*Lomb prize essay: Practical, Sanitary and Economic Cooking, by Mary Hinman Abel, printed by E. R. Andrews, published by American Health Association, price forty-two cents. Contains bills of fare. Class I, seventy-eight cents per day, or thirteen cents per person for family of six. Class II, $1.26 per day for six. Class III, $1.38 per day for six. Mathieu Williams' Chemistry of Cookery. Appleton & Co., New York.

housewife is familiar with these in such foods as the lean of meat, eggs and cheese. These contain the principle in various proportions, for example:

Lean of meat has	15-21	per cent.
Eggs in both white and yolk	12.5	"
Cow's milk, fresh, averages	3.4	"
Cheese	2.5-30	"
Dried cod-fish	30	"
Wheat flour has	10-12	"
Peas, beans and lentils	22.85-27.7	"

Vegetables are more deficient in proteids, though the grains and legumes contain much of it.

In fresh vegetables we find only from ½ to 3 per cent, if we except green peas and beans, in which the proteids reach 5 to 6.5 per cent. Proteids are indispensable, as the nitrogen furnishes the tissues, and are flesh foods.

FATS.

Fats are obtained from both the animal and the vegetable oils. Cereals, like corn and oats, contain from 4 to 7 per cent. Vegetable food, as a rule, is very poor in fats. The fats are heat foods.

CARBOHYDRATES.

Carbohydrates are found mainly in vegetables and are known to the housekeeper as starches and sugar. With the starches proper are included such things as the starches of grains and seeds, Iceland moss, gums and dextrine. Milk contains on an average about 4.8 per cent of this principle and is exceptional among animal products in this respect. Carbohydrates are the working foods.

MINERALS.

Salts give hardness to the bones, such as calcium phosphate, the common salt, etc.; the latter serves to make the water in the system a solvent.

FLAVORINGS.

Flavorings cannot be classified in the same way. Their value is in their appetizing qualities or acids, as in fruits, coffee and spices, etc. They are to be used to give zest to the appetite—" to make the mouth water"—and, as in the case of fresh vegetables and fruits, after a winter's deprivation, everybody will recognize their importance. The condiments are held to be useful in the mixed diet in concealing and giving flavor.

To return to proteids, it is well to bear in mind that there are three great classes of proteids:—albumens proper, caseins and fibrins, and that in both plants and animals are found representatives of these three classes: Thus, in plant juices and in eggs are the albumen class; the curd of sour milk and the legumine of the pod-covered plants are examples of caseins; and in the gluten of grains and the clot whipped out of blood are examples of fibrins.

THE STRUCTURE OF MEAT.

The red part is made up of: first very tiny sausage-like bags or muscle fibres, as they are called, and in these is contained the precious proteid matters, flavors and salts all mixed together with water into a kind of jelly; second: these muscle fibres are bound together by strands of connective tissue, as the white stringy mass is called (it yields the gelatine) in which the fat and blood vessels are lodged; this is also of food value, but inferior to the fibres; third: dissolved in the juices floating between the fibres and strands, there is also a proteid soluble albumen. The little bags of proteid when gotten at, are as digestible in the stomach as the white of egg, though like the egg their flavor is improved by slight cooking. But they are imprisoned in the connective tissue somewhat as are the starch grains of the potato in the cellulose.

SOFTENING CONNECTIVE TISSUE.

This connective tissue can be softened by heat, thereby turning it into a sort of gelatine; but, unfortunately, if the meat be not very tender, this requires a longer application of the heat than is needed to cook the delicate albumen, all full of flavors too easily lost. To soften the connective tissue without overcooking the albumen, is one of the problems of cooking.

ALBUMEN.

Albumen, a type of the proteid food stuffs, should be raised to a temperature not over one hundred and seventy degrees to get the best results in cooking. Take the egg as an example. To soft boil an egg it should not be raised above 170 degrees. The white will then become a tender, jelly-like substance. If exposed to a higher temperature the white becomes horny, while the yolk remains uncooked, or becomes pasty. To boil an egg hard, simply continue the heat at one hundred and seventy degrees for twenty minutes to half an hour. The cooked yolk is said to be more digestible than the semi-liquid. Eggs cooked soft or solid in this manner are more digestible and more delicate than if kept in boiling water three and one-half minutes as has been usual. After the first twenty-four hours, eggs steadily deteriorate. Do not give an invalid an egg more than two or three days old, and keep in sweet air as the shells are porous.

To bring about the results desired there are two ways. First, use a pail or jar (heated before the water is put in) and allow one quart of boiling water to four eggs, wrapped in a flannel cloth. The eggs will be done in six minutes, but not harmed by ten. Second, put the eggs into cold water and bring slowly to a boil. They are done when the water begins to boil.

BOILING.

Water cannot (under ordinary atmospheric pressure) be raised to a higher temperature than 212 degrees Farenheit—the boiling point. Water is scalding hot at 150 degrees when the hand cannot be borne in it; it simmers when the bubbles all collapse beneath the surface at about 170 degrees, and it boils when the bubbles rise to the surface and the steam is thrown off at 212 degrees. Boiling violently does not raise the temperature, and it is an advantage only when mechanical work is to be done. Simmering water, 170 degrees to 180 degrees, is the right temperature for the cooking of albumens.

If meat is to boiled for beef broth, put it in cold water and allow it to simmer only from eight to twelve hours, adding enough boiling water to rinse meat and bones; to make 1¼ quarts of broth use one pound meat, one pound bone, and cool as rapidly as possible. This gives the best invalid broth to be obtained for nutrition.

To boil beef or mutton that is itself to be served, it should be put in boiling water, brought and kept to a boil for ten minutes to sear the surface well, and then the temperature lowered to the simmering heat for the cooking of the albumen and hydrating of the connective tissue, which makes it tender. When beef has changed color from the bluish tint to red in the center, it is done. Inferior parts should be cut in pieces and stewed till tender at 170 to 180 degrees, not over—and then seasoned. This requires more time than the cook-books usually allow. The aim is to hold the temperature of the cooking medium just high enough to keep the heat traveling toward the interior of the meat.

THERMOMETERS.

To cook meat at the right temperature, the center of the roast or the broil to come to 150 or 160 degrees is no easy matter with the usual kitchen appliances. Even over an easily regulated heater, as a gas or coal oil flame, how is one to know that temperature when it is reached? A thermometer was constructed for the writer after the model of those used in laboratories; a thermometer tube registering 300 degrees, Celsius, was simply fastened into a cork, the bulb projecting below and protected by a short cylinder of wood. This floated on the water and made it easy to cook at any given temperature. This thermometer was also hung in a light, wire frame and used for testing the heat of an oven. (Mrs. H. A.)

Gelatine, as a food, has been over-estimated, and the housewife commonly holds the opinion that soup stock and gelatine jellies supply nutriment. Gelatine must be combined with the juices and flavorings of beef to serve as a food. Beef tea, on the other hand, is a stimulant and conserver of tissues, but not a food to make tissue, while the solid beef, deprived of its juices, will not, until the flavoring extracts be restored, sustain life for any great length of time.

In roasting, broiling and frying the flavors, salts and albumens are kept in the meat as nature mixed them. They are concentrated considerably by evaporating the water by which they are naturally diluted. The difference between the roasting or broiling and the stewing of meat, is that the former, in the shape of a broiled chop or a roasted joint, are stewed in their own juices; in both cases the changes taking place in the solid parts of the meat are the same in kind, provided always the roasting or broiling is properly done. The albumen is coagulated in all cases, and the gelatinous and fibrous tissues are softened by being heated in a liquid solvent.

The difference between the flavor of English roast beef and French bouilli or Italian manzo is due to the retention or the removal of the saline and highly flavored soluble materials; (concentrated kreatine is pungently sapid). The Frenchman takes them out of his bouilli or broiled meat, and transfers them to his bouillon or soup, which with him is an essential element of a meal. To the Englishman, with his roast or broiled meat, soup is merely a luxury, not an absolutely necessary element of a complete dietary. It is a fairly debatable question whether the simplicity of taste which finds satisfaction in the milder diet is better and more desirable than the appetite for strong meat.—(M. W.)

Browning the crust of meats not only makes the food more palatable, as also the crust of bread by converting in the latter its starch into dextrine, but by a process perhaps analogous it develops a flavor, and the chemical changes help it to become more assimilable. The crust of bread has also disinfectant properties, so this writer tells us, having an appreciable effect on water slightly tainted with decomposing organic matter.

The food value of cheese and recipes for these, with a a few more practical hints as to the methods of cooking and economic buying will be given in the next article.

THE WORK OF THE W. C. T. U. IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF WOMEN.

BY ISABELLA WEBB PARKS.

God's kingdom is one, and all of its interests so indissolubly united that one cannot be promoted without a corresponding advance of the others. Baffled and beaten back by difficulties, which at first sight seem outside of his path, the assailer of a long established evil, is forced to take up one line of work after another in order to accomplish his single purpose. Thus it becomes the common experience of reformers that the result which they seek constantly eludes them, until they become heart-sick with hope deferred, while incidently, along coördinate lines, they accomplish a work for which they had not planned and whose magnitude they do not realize. Thus God uses those whose narrow vision can compass only the little portion of his plans that lies nearest to them.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is recognized as a great temperance organization; very few realize its magnitude as the wonderful woman's movement of this woman's century. As to its great central purpose—world-wide total abstinence for the individual and prohibition of the liquor traffic by the state—no one can measure its power nor predict its achievements, for the battle is not yet on. It has accomplished much valuable temperance work, had some skirmishes with the enemy, but the mighty conflict is yet to come.

Incidentally the W. C. T. U. has already done a work for women of which its founders never dreamed. It has been and is a wonderful training-school. It has developed the unconscious, latent powers of women, and has given them opportunities for usefulness which they could have found nowhere else in all this prejudice-blinded world. Its numerous departments, most of them forced into being by the exigencies of the cause, others taken up to avoid the needless multiplication of organizations, give scope for the most diversified tastes and talents. The little band of crusaders has grown into a mighty army, and, whatever else the W. C. T. U. may or may not accomplish, it has developed and elevated woman according to the purpose of the one great reform from which all others draw their inspiration—Christianity.

One of the saddest, bitterest experiences of the writer's life was when Frances Willard left the Deanship of the Woman's College of the Northwestern University. It seemed to the vision of that day, there was no other work for which she was so preëminently fitted; that there were none in all the world who needed her so much as the girls of the nineteenth century who, looking out into a future full of untried responsibilities for women, were, as Mary Livermore expressed it, "lying in the trough of the sea." But God saw with no near-sighted vision. The girls of the nineteenth century needed a leader—not only the girls but the entire womanhood of the age.

The W. C. T. U. developed a leader, not a despot, and the leader has developed with unerring sagacity, hundreds of helpers, who lead grandly in their smaller orbits all over the world, the best in each one glowing for the best interests of all; each with a generous appreciation of the other, measuring up to the highest possibilities because of the unlimited faith which made her what she is. She that believeth most is most and best served.

But not less important than the development of our leaders is the development of the rank and file of our women. As has been said, "chief among the many marvelous discoveries of the nineteenth century is woman's discovery of herself." She has been brought to a knowledge of herself through work which demanded qualifications never called into requisition by her previous life, and the W. C. T. U. has been the chief agency. Its work required executive ability of high degree, it required organizers, financiers, statesmen, jurists, writers, speakers, editors, publishers, evangelists, temple builders. Distrustful of self but sure of God, women have undertaken all these kinds of work and have succeeded beyond anything they had dared to ask or think.

Besides this, the temperance work has taught women to discriminate between the small and the great things of life. The infinite insignificance of "fancy work" has become apparent when weighed against the work of saving the victims of liquor. White-ribboners have been lifted out of narrow, self-centered lives into a broad sympathy with suffering humanity. The doors into the wide, wide world have opened before them never to close again.

Men of one idea in a new, but extremely literal sense, denounce the W. C. T. U. as a Woman's Suffrage Association. It has, indeed, done more for the cause than any suffrage association in the world. We do not revolutionize for mere ideas. So long as woman's suffrage was argued chiefly as an abstract right, it made converts slowly, but when woman found herself handicapped along lines of practical work by her political disabilities, the cause of her enfranchisement made rapid progress. I have the profoundest pity, not unmingled with contempt, for the small souls who see nothing but "personal ambition" in the demand of the noblest womanhood of this nation and of England for the ballot with which to protect themselves and their dear ones. Sorely against their will the great majority of white-ribbon women entered the realm of politics because their enemy was there and they "must fight him where he was, not where he was not." Baffled and turned back at every step by the taunting cry, "You can't vote, ladies, you can't vote," the once timid host has lifted its banners and firmly replies, "But with God's help we will vote." The nobler manhood of the nation is taking up the cry, for they, too, are coming to see that by the aid of woman's vote alone can moral reforms be secured.

The development which has come to the workers of the W. C. T. U., the broader outlook, the greater opportunities are not for themselves alone. All womanhood has been elevated thereby. Prejudice against women as public speakers dissolves like mist when some of its great orators stand upon the platform. Its most supercilious enemies cannot deny after sitting in a W. C. T. U. convention that women know how to conduct public assemblies according to the most approved parliamentary methods. Arguments against women anywhere fall flat in the face of what women are doing everywhere. It has been demonstrated that what man has done, woman can also do. Henceforth if she is to be shut out from any field of labor, it must be on some other plea than that God has created her incompetent for the place. She has done the work and has no further need to speak.

"The universe shall henceforth speak for her, and witness
She who did this thing was born to do it—
Claims her license in her work."

SPEAKING IN PUBLIC.

[A Canadian journal gives the following critical analysis of the qualities needful for the impressive platform speaker. The ability to address an audience being an indispensable part of the outfit of a W. C. T. U. public worker, Professor Robertson's helpful article is herein reproduced for whomsoever "it may concern."—EDS.]

THE PUBLIC SPEAKER.

For his equipment and fitness for the effort and the duty of the present—the now—every man is indebted to all the past—the past in himself—the past in his immediate ancestors—and the past in the race to which he belongs. Man is unique in his faculty and habit of appropriating the gains of his fellows. That does not mean that he is the only animal with thievish propensities and practices. But for honestly augmenting his knowledge and powers, by the acquisitions of the best and worst of his kind, he outstrips all other creatures on earth. He makes progress by acquiring and by giving. The art of oratory at its best is an acquired power, and at its best, when used without embellishments, it is plain, effective speaking in public.

Popular ignorance has viewed its favor as being bestowed upon only a few men of genius. Efficiency is an attainment, not a gift. Some of its common accessories—such as a rich voice and handsome form—are particular gifts. Effective speaking in public is not recitation and not declamation. It is not making or being an echo, but it is the action of a living voice of intelligence. A few of its particular qualities may be discovered by an examination of what successful, effective public speakers have said and how they have said it.

1. The MORAL QUALITIES stand out first in preëminent distinctiveness.

(a) Sincerity is a prime virtue in public speech. For what would the masterly volubility of Gladstone count if the people thought him insincere? Did not the sincerity of Paul atone for contemptible presence and weakness of speech?

(b) Absence of self-seeking and mean motive is essential to the best efficiency. "Never man spake as this Man;" and He was the servant of all.

(c) Courage, fearlessness and self-reliance are valiant aids if all appearance of self-confidence be avoided. It is the duty of every aspirant after success to make the most of his powers—to exalt his opportunities and then to make himself worthy of them.

(d) Earnestness of expression is to words what momentum is to a bullet. From the tips of the finger nails to the glow in the eye, and the tension in the voice, earnestness of manner will lend a kind of life to even soulless sentences.

(e) Good nature, amiability and geniality put a pleasing complexion on a dry subject; they put a bloom of attractiveness on the lips and words of the speaker. To say a spiteful or malicious word in public speech, is to jump on the edge of one's own sword for the purpose of wounding an enemy.

2. There are INTELLECTUAL QUALITIES whose component parts may be named.

(a) Clearness or lucidity is most important. The learning and ability, which make thoughts and statements plain and easy to understand, need no further indorsement. Some speakers need to be labelled by certain titles or letters; otherwise, the public would never find out that they were learned in letters or anything else.

An active, disciplined imagination is an almost indispensable possession in the acquisition of a clear and lucid style. He who can create vivid mental pictures of what he seeks to tell, will find little difficulty in finding words to relate and describe his visions. In speaking in public of a cow, a cornstalk or a hope of Heaven, first make a mental image to represent the thought, and then describe it graphically until you make your audience hear a sight of it.

(b) Fairness is somewhat akin to sincerity. He who is unfair in statement rides an ill-adjusted conveyance.

(c) Forceful speaking does not imply making a great effort. To get the meat out of an egg-shell does not require that it should be cut with a slash that could decapitate an elephant. The intelligent exercise of force will enable the same hand to pluck a pansy and to hew down an oak. Why should the movements of the hands and the modulations of the voice be serious objects of concern to the ignoring or the forgetting of the goal towards which the speaker should carry his hearers?

(d) Beauty of expression should be cultivated in speech. Animation is easily induced by a display of beauty. Polishing does not weaken an instrument. The heathens recognized the supremacy of beauty when they pictured Venus riding on a tiger.

(e) Humor, fun, wit open up the receptivity of the listeners; they also give edge to the dull tools of weary argument. What may be called genuine fun is to speech, what music is to sound.

Doctrine that sounds well, is, to many, sound doctrine. An oratorical temperament is not necessary; now-a-days it is seldom advantageous to a public speaker. In fifty cases out of fifty-one, a man with a temperament which is highly oratorical, is incurably lazy. The products of such a combination will commonly be brilliancy and absurdity.

3. The PHYSICAL QUALITIES of a speaker, and of speaking in public, are important, in proportion to the dullness and ignorance of the audience.

(a) The voice, while an instrument of sound, is to the speaker an instrument of thought. By it he shapes and regulates the scattering of his thought over the minds of his hearers. Purity of tone—as distinguished from affectation—is the chiefest excellence. The cultivation of a cheerful temper has the knack of bestowing a voice of pleasing and persuasive power.

(b) Facial expression is the capital of a comic actor. A public speaker, whose main capital is a purse (facial expression), had better engage only in business where the display of a pocket-book is proof of being rich. The mouth is the seat of refinement and brutality; its user will mould its expression to give fitting accompaniment to his thought.

(c) In the management of the body, an erect, firm and composed attitude, without stiffness, is to be desired. Dignity of bearing gives dignity of feeling; and dignity of feeling inspires dignity of thought and utterance.

(d) Gestures, which exhibit the image of the speaker's thought, are welcome assistants; but those which show off only the agility of the speaker's body are unpardonable intruders. Quietness, definiteness, precision and promptness are admirable qualities.

THE BRITISH TEMPERANCE PARLIAMENT.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A parliament of representative temperance men and women is in session in this historic hall and national Congregational headquarters.

The delegates were appointed by the national temperance societies of the United Kingdom, and their object is to debate until they can agree on the measures to be brought before Parliament. Hon. Leonard Courtney, for many years deputy speaker in Parliament is the presiding officer and I am much interested in watching his methods. He has no gavel but keeps gently calling, "Order, order!" and emphasizing these words by "Wait" and "Sit down," beneath which the delegates meekly resume their seats, mild as is the chairman's official intonation.

Here is Mr. Caine, M. P., vice-president of the meeting; Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the alert-moving, swift-minded speaker and reformer; Mr. Joseph Malins, so long a leader among Good Templars; Canon Leigh with his white hair and gentle face (son-in-law of Frances Kemble, the famous actress recently deceased); J. H. Raper, the famous war-horse of the English temperance reform; Rev. G. A. Bennetts, temperance leader of the Wesleyans; Mr. Turnbull, former chief of the World's Grand Lodge of Good Templars; James Whyte and Henry J. Osborn, of the United Kingdom Alliance; Stafford Howard, of the Church of England temperance society, and no end of leading figures to the number of one hundred and twenty-five or more, besides the women's contingent, headed by Lady Henry Somerset, Mrs. Ormiston-Chant, Miss Docwra, Miss Florence Balgarnie and others.

It was most kind of this most representative gathering ever held in England, to vote unanimously to let their Yankee cousin (as the one exception made) be present at all these sessions, to which one is admitted only after two tickets have been passed upon by the guardians of the gates.

They are now debating the measure (likely to be proposed next week in Parliament) of Sunday closing for England—by local option! It is a curious suggestion and might so divide a street that dram-shops should be closed on one side of the street and open on the other. Hugh Price Hughes has just made a fiery speech against local option as a feature of Sunday closing.

The manner of speaking is most interesting—in the main it is what is known as "parliamentary," i. e. full of inflexions, up and down the gamut, with "hums and haws," and nuggets of solid British sense flung out between. Just as I am writing one speaker has said: "Gentlemen and ladies," the first recognition of the sisterhood thus far given, except that Mrs. Ormiston-Chant has spoken for a minute in her own witty way.

This conference is the guest of A. F. Hills, Esq., a gentleman of great wealth who is president of the National Vegetarian Federal union. We are to have each day of the three that we are to be in session, a vegetarian banquet in a beautiful hall set apart for such uses in this great building. (Later:) The tables were gay with flowers and rare fruits, nuts and preserved fruits were piled on broad glass dishes. We began with mock turtle and tomato soups, continued on macaroni cutlets with "piquant sauce," haricots, "Mexican fashion," new potatoes, spinach, peas, cold pie and salad, artichokes au gratin, and closed on apricot souffle, vanilla moulds, baked custard and pistachio cream, (no tea or coffee).

Mr. Hills told me at lunch (in reply to my question, "How did you come to be a vegetarian?") the following interesting experience: He had come home from college in the winter, and being very fond of hunting, he called for his favorite dog and proposed to go out duck shooting. But the dog could not be found and so Mr. Hills went to the river alone. Two ducks were paddling sociably along in the narrow strip of water between the icy shores. The young collegian fired; one of the birds fell on the ice, wounded, and having no retriever, as the ice was thin he had nothing to do but wait and watch its dying agonies. Something in his soul said, "Why did I cut short this happy, harmless life? Why introduce this jarring note into the general harmony?" and then and there he vowed never to hunt again. Then, as the years passed, he was rallied on his desertion of the chase in all its forms, and often it was said, "If you will not kill why do you eat?" and so, twelve years ago, he became a vegetarian, and a very well-to-do specimen he is.

Well, they are talking on and on. Mr. Joseph Malins has just made a speech, especially clear and convincing to my mind. He "makes points" right along. He says: "This is the temperance people's parliament—that of St. Stephens must carry out our wishes. We are the temperance party and we will not accept from the government this specious device of an option on Sunday closing." Finally, a strong resolution against any option on that subject has been adopted.

Meanwhile a reporter from one of the morning papers came to me to ask my opinion of the action of a Church of England clergyman "who has taken the public house in his own village under his own care, and dispenses liquors in a wise and moderate manner!" I told him that in my country all of us who belonged to any church, no matter how humble, were equally "church people," and that a "clergyman" who would make this attempt would find the other clergy and church people so "dead against him" that he would soon "give over." (These are pithy bits of English here acquired.)

We have now been in session seven hours (with one for lunch) and have made good headway. Lady Henry Somerset has just risen (the only person received with applause). She offers a resolution to prohibit publicans from selling to children under sixteen years of age, either for their own use or that of others; and so these kind, benignant spirits patiently plod on, trying to "make it easier for everybody to do right and difficult to do wrong."

Incalculable will be the good to homes and humans from this square day's work.

Yours for the better life,

Frances E. Willard

LITTLE THINGS.

BY M. O. PAGE.

There is some little thing each day
For God's own ones to do or say;
Some trifling work, although it be
Unnoticed in its ministry.
Yet still some fine discerning soul,
Needs but this touch to make it whole.

It is not always we are stirred
By loving voice or helping word;
But something deeper in its power,
Has gently thrilled the passing hour,
And won some recreant heart, may be,
To life and God and liberty.

MYRA'S SELF-DENIAL WEEK.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

"I wish I could help, but how can I? I've 'cut down' and 'retrenched' and 'economized' till I feel like a miser now, and if there is one thing I can deny myself on any line, I'd be glad to know it!"

Such was the soliloquy uttered in a half undertone by Myra Welch, a school teacher in the town of Tacona, and a member of the Tacona W. C. T. U. She had just returned from a meeting of the union at which the president had been urging the matter of Self-denial Week. "I think we can each one deny ourselves something to which we have been accustomed and which it will do us no harm to go without for one week."

"Much she knows about it!" sighed Myra, remembering the weary walks taken every day that car-fare might be saved; the clothing darned, turned and re-turned, and the hours of work, after school closed, at fine sewing, for which but scant remuneration was given; all this that she might not only support herself, but send home from month to month what she could spare that a sick brother might have the nourishing food and medical care he so much needed.

Clearly there was no room for self-denial here, "and therefore," argued Myra, "no responsibility upon me about it." But the subject would not be dismissed and kept turning itself over in the girl's mind as she stitched away on the garment before her.

"Poor thing," she said, talking aloud again as she often did to break the silence of her lonely room. "Poor little white ribbon! If you could talk I suppose you would reproach me, but you know I am honest, and honestly I haven't a thing in which I am rich, or have 'enough and to spare,' unless it be thoughts, and they are not convertible into dollars and cents, at least, not in my case."

When ten o'clock struck she took her Bible in her hand. But her heart for some reason was heavy within her, and instead of her customary reading, she dropped on her knees and hid her face in her hands.

Perhaps Tacona union had no more earnest member in heart than Myra Welch, for she was wholly committed to the temperance cause and worked in every way she could. The call for money was the one to which she could rarely respond, but she had tried to make up the lack by an earnest participation in all meetings and an eager loyalty to all plans. Never before had the question of money troubled her as it did on this occasion, and the matter became the whole burden of her prayers that night.

"I am getting proud," she thought. "I am ashamed to say 'No.' Well, if that is the case, the more I'm humbled the better. I guess the Lord can fill up the World's W. C. T. U. treasury without any help from Myra Welch. So there!" and she turned out the gas with a decided little snap and lay down to her much-needed rest.

Myra had one possession which she called her rich inheritance, a deep soul-love for, and soul-appreciation of music. When a child her father had given her a violin which he had much prized, and by dint of hard practice in odd moments she had attained to no slight degree of efficiency in the use of the instrument. It was her delight every morning, before the duties of the day began, to spend an hour playing. On the morning following the day of the W. C. T. U. meeting, Myra rose even earlier than usual, and taking her violin from its case, stroked the dark wood tenderly and said, "You are the one thing I am 'accustomed to' that approaches a luxury, and I am glad there is no need of going without you," and thereupon followed a flood of melody so joyous, that a man passing muttered to himself, "Somebody feels mighty good this morning!" But no music could quite chase away the obstinate thoughts touching the week of self-denial, and the instrument was laid by after a few minutes' use. Myra had prayed earnestly that if there was any way in which she could answer to this appeal it might be shown her. It lacked half an hour yet to breakfast, but she could neither play nor work nor read; thought was too busy.

"Willingness ought to count," she said to herself. "I am sure no one is more willing than I. If thinking would make money I'd think our treasurer's hands full in less than no time!" and she laughed a little, passing her hand over her aching head. "If I could only think to some purpose!"

Her Bible lay where she had left it the night before and taking it up she read the old story about the loaves and the fishes. Over and over, yet again she read it, a light dawning in her eyes and a growing thought quickening her pulses. She thought aloud, slowly reasoning her way out. "The boy hadn't very much and the need was great. But he didn't refuse to let the Lord have them. What if I turn my desire to help into prayers for the cause? Maybe God can use thoughts if they are given to Him. I'll pray! And I'll pray mornings instead of having a selfish good time. I just believe God means me to 'deny' in this way seeing there is no other."

Thus it came about that the violin lay in its case and the musician was on her knees talking with God about the work and its needs, the workers and those for whom they spent their strength. As she prayed her eyes were opened to many ways in which she could give more aid in the battle for "Every Land." The week was near its close when Mrs. Russell came to Myra with a request.

"On Sunday evening," she said, "a union service will be held in charge of the white ribboners. At that meeting we will make a special plea along temperance lines, taking of course the inevitable 'collection,' every cent contributed to be turned over to the World's W. C. T. U. treasury. I came to ask you to help—to pray and to work."

Myra's heart began to beat.

"You play so beautifully—will you play for us that night? My daughter will sing—could you play her accompaniments?"

"Oh, Mrs. Russell! Anything—"

"There, there, do not say 'no' so soon. Think about it and let me know to-morrow."

Myra had never played in public. It was the one thing she had always insisted she "could not and would not do." But as she spent the hour in prayer the next morning, she was led to some deeper thinking along the line of self-denial, and as a result her answer that evening to Mrs. Russell's question was in the affirmative—though given with fear and trembling.

Sunday night came. The house was full. On the platform, among the others, sat Myra, outwardly calm, inwardly fearful, yet determined. Eva Russell had a beautiful voice, and just after her mother's opening prayer, sang the well-known hymn:

"Rescue the perishing,
Care for the dying,
Snatch them in pity from sin and the grave."

A thrill of enthusiasm from the audience answered the sweet voice, with its soulful accompaniment, and the chorus was caught up by hundreds of eager voices.

The key-note of the evening had been struck, and there were few hearts untouched by the earnest words from the women who were bound together against the world's curse. Prayers were offered from lips that hitherto had been slow to speak. Pledges were signed, some of them by young men whose stand on the temperance question, it had been feared, was uncertain. A free-will offering was called for.

"This is not a regular collection, friends," said Mrs. Russell. "Let nothing be given from the hand that is not offered by the heart. If you are glad to-night that your home is untouched by the curse, praise the Lord in dollars and cents. If your heart aches because some dear one is tempted, has fallen, perhaps, lend your aid to keep this sorrow from some other home. If you have ever wished the evil of intemperance wiped off God's earth, back up the wish out of the money God has blessed you with."

What moved her Myra did not stop to think, but just as the collectors were passing down the aisles, she took her violin, and, unasked, began to play. Her heart was uplifted in prayer, her playing almost unconscious, and after a few low strains, the lovely melody of "Jesus, Lover of My Soul" filled the house.

Away in the rear sat a white-haired old man. He had listened to all that was said, but evinced little interest. When the opportunity was given for a free-will offering, he made no move to comply. Myra's violin was growing more and more eloquent. Tears were quietly brushed aside. The old man on the back seat leaned forward and buried his face in his hands. The last time he had heard that hymn was when he leaned above the coffin of his only son, who had been brought to that coffin by drink.

If your heart aches because some dear one has fallen, lend your aid.

"Cover my defenseless head
With the shadow of thy wing."

The hardness of years was melted, and the old father wept, not only wept, but prayed. The collection-box had been the rounds. The violin had ceased its pleading. A few words of prayer, and the service was over. The audience passed out, but the white-haired old man waited.

As Myra was nearing the door, trying to make a hurried escape from kindly, but just then, unwelcome words of praise, a hand on her arm checked her. It was the old man.

"Daughter," he said, tremulously, "God bless you. You don't know how I have been blessed this night. Wait a minute,—I have a little offering. You will drop it in for me? May it keep some father's son from drink!" and he laid a shining piece of gold in her hand.

"God has indeed blessed my poor 'loaves and fishes,'" thought Myra, as she dropped the money quietly among the rest and slipped away. "I am glad I was too poor to give money—God provided for His treasury in a better way than I could possibly have done."

And from that time to this Myra's morning hour has been her "temperance fund," and who shall say what has been the outcome of her true self-denial?

HOW DR. GUTHRIE BECAME A TEETOTALLER.

"I was first led" he told a temperance meeting in Belfast in 1862 "to form a high opinion of the cause of temperance by the hearing of an Irishman. It is now some twenty-two years ago. I had left Omagh on a bitter, biting, blasting day, with lashing rain, and had to travel across a cold country to Cookston. Well, by the time we got over half the road, we reached a small inn, into which we went, as sailors in stress of weather run into the first haven. By this time we were soaking with water outside, and as these were the days not of tea and toast but of toddy drinking, we thought the best way was to soak ourselves with whisky inside. Accordingly, we rushed into the inn, ordered warm water, and got our tumbler of toddy. Out of kindness to the car-driver we called him in; he was not very well clothed—indeed, he rather belonged in that respect to the order of my Ragged School in Edinburgh. He was soaking wet, and we offered him a good rummer of toddy; we thought that what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander; but the car-driver was not such a gander as we, like geese, took him for. He would not taste it. 'Why,' we asked, 'what objection have you?' Said he: 'Plaze your riv'rence, I am a teetotaller and I won't taste a drop of it.'

"Well, that stuck in my throat, and it went to my heart and in another sense than drink, though, it went to my head. Here was a humble, uncultivated, uneducated Roman Catholic car-man, and I said, 'If that man can deny himself this indulgence, why should not I, a Christian minister?' I remembered that, and I have ever remembered it to the honor of Ireland. I have often told the story, and thought of the example set by that poor Irishman for our people to follow. I carried home the remembrance of it with me to Edinburgh. That circumstance, along with the scenes in which I was called to labor daily for years, made me a teetotaller."

HOW TO PROMOTE HARMONY AMONG CHURCH-MEMBERS.

1. To remember that we are all subject to failings and infirmities of one kind or another.
2. To bear with and not magnify each other's infirmities. Gal. 6: 1–2.
3. To pray for one another in our social meetings, and particularly in private. James 5: 16.
4. To avoid going from house to house to interfere with other people's business.
5. Always turn a deaf ear to any slanderous report.
6. If a member be in fault, to tell him of it in private, before it is mentioned to others.
7. Watch against a shyness of each other, and put the best construction on every action.
8. To leave off contention before it be meddled with. Prov. 17: 14.
9. If a member has offended, to consider how Godlike it is to forgive. Eph. 4: 2.
10. Remember that Satan desires to promote animosity among members of churches.
11. To consider how much more good we can do in the world at large, and in the church in particular, when we are all united in love than we can when indulging a contrary spirit.
12. Lastly, to consider the express injunction of Scripture, and the beautiful example of Christ, as to these important things. John 13: 5; 16–35; Eph. 4: 32; I Peter 2: 21.

BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

In Genesis the world was made;
In Exodus the march is told;
Leviticus contains the law;
In Numbers are the tribes enrolled.

In Deuteronomy again
We're urged to keep God's law alone;
And these five works of Moses make
The oldest writings that are known.

Brave Joshua to Canaan leads;
In Judges oft the Jews rebel;
We read of David's name in Ruth
And First and Second Samuel.

In First and Second Kings we read
How bad the Hebrew state became;
In First and Second Chronicles
Another history of the same.

In Ezra captive Jews return,
And Nehemiah builds the wall;
Queen Esther saves her race from death.
These books "historical" we call.

In Job we read of patient faith;
The Psalms are David's songs of praise;
The Proverbs are to make us wise;
Ecclesiastes next portrays

How fleeting earthly pleasures are;
The Song of Solomon is all
About the love of Christ; and these
Five books "devotional" we call.

Isaiah tells of Christ to come,
While Jeremiah tells of woe,
And in his Lamentations mourns
The Holy City's overthrow.

Ezekiel speaks of mysteries,
And Daniel foretells kings of old;
Hosea calls men to repent;
In Joel blessings are foretold.

Amos tells of wrath; and Edom
Obadiah's sent to warn;
While Jonah shows that Christ should die,
And Micah where He should be born.

In Nahum Nineveh is seen;
In Habakkuk Chaldea's guilt;
In Zephaniah Judah's sins;
In Haggai the temple built;

Zechariah speaks of Christ,
And Malachi, of John, His sign.
The prophets number seventeen,
And all the books are thirty-nine.

Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and John,
Tell what Christ did in every place;
Acts show what the Apostles did,
And Romans how we're saved by grace.

Corinthians instructs the church;
Galatians shows us faith alone;
Ephesians true love, and in
Philippians God's grace is shown.

Collossians tells us more of Christ,
And Thessalonians of the end;
In Timothy and Titus both
Are rules for pastors to attend.

Philemon Christian friendship shows;
Then Hebrews clearly tells us how all
The Jewish law prefigured Christ:
And these epistles are by Paul.

James shows that faith by works must live,
And Peter urges steadfastness,
While John exhorts to Christian love,
For those who have it God will bless.

Jude shows the end of evil men,
And Revelation tells of heaven.
This ends the whole New Testament,
And all the books are twenty-seven.

NANNIE, AND THE SQUIRREL PANTRY.

BY MARY M. NORTH.

Nannie's aunt and cousins lived in the country and Nannie was very fond of spending her summers with them, but she longed to visit the country in winter. The boys had told her so much of the sports of winter, and the girls had related stories of remarkable adventures on skates and runners, till poor Nannie thought it was not living at all, unless you were in a large, old-fashioned house, all gables, with a big barn near, in which were sleek cattle and well-groomed horses, and a great field surrounding all, with a stream crossing one corner, in which the cattle stood knee-deep on hot days, and looked, oh, so comfortable.

She, in imagination, peopled this stream's banks with fairies, who worked wonders in winter, and built ice palaces, and frosty bridges, and held gay revels every night, not minding the cold at all.

As winter drew near (after Nannie had spent a particularly happy summer in the country) her father found he had to take a business trip, and on the way would pass his sister's home, so he resolved, after consulting his wife, to take his daughter and leave her to spend a few days with her cousins. Great was Nannie's delight when she heard it, and the days did not fly quickly enough.

At last the happy day dawned, and Nannie was up betimes, and ready. It was still early when she was set down at her aunt's door; the country air was frosty and made her ears tingle, but that was enjoyed as one of the delights of the country, and she could not be induced to stay in the house, but must explore every nook and corner to see if there had been any change since her departure a few months before.

Her cousin Harry was just her age and the girls were younger, so Nannie chose Harry for her companion, as he could sympathize with her, and enter into her schemes for pleasure. The woods were actually glorified; the grand old maples and oaks in their yellow, russet and variegated dresses, with the intense scarlet of the sumacs and Virginia creepers were a feast for the eyes. Nannie wanted all the pretty leaves she saw and her cousin had to beg her not to weigh him down with her trophies. They passed the stream on their way back to the house, and Nannie tried to find one little sign of ice, but could not.

One day when near an old corn-crib, not now in use by the farmer, Nannie gave a scream of delight, for there, running down the side, were two red squirrels. She had never seen any until that time.

"Come," said Harry, "and I'll show you how they provide for winter; that is their store-house, and we never disturb them or make a noise near here."

They went up the three or four steps, opened the door, and what do you think they saw? Why, actually, a great pile of nuts, all laid as symmetrically as if some hand had placed them for exhibition.

"Hush," said Harry, "stand still and you will see them at work."

Presently an old gray squirrel came and deposited a butternut very carefully, his great bushy tail not even shaking the topmost nut from its place; after a while another, then another, came each with his burden, then a dear little red squirrel; all added to the pile, working harmoniously and having all things in common. Harry had to almost pull Nannie away at last, so absorbed was she in watching these wonderful little creatures laying up their provisions for "a rainy day."

Her visit almost passed without any of the longed-for snow falling, but towards night of the day before the last of her visit, the sky looked gray and before bed-time the boys brought the joyful news to Nannie, that it was snowing. Her tongue could hardly be kept still long enough for her to go to sleep.

In the morning there was a lovely, sparkling, white robe over everything outdoors. It was too soft for sleighing, so Nannie had to content herself with looking at it, and going out in it with her overshoes on. In the afternoon she went to the corn-crib and peeped in, and there sat a dear little squirrel eating his well-earned dinner. After that, every little while, till her father came, she visited that squirrel pantry, never seeming to tire of watching the cunning little animals. When she went away her greatest regret, was at leaving the squirrels.

Washington, D. C.

A LITTLE girl went out to play in the snow, and when she came in she said, "Mamma, I couldn't help praying when I was out at play."

"What did you pray, my dear?"

"I prayed the snow-prayer, mamma, that I learnt once in Sunday-school: 'Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.' "

What a beautiful prayer! And here is the promise that goes with it: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." And what can wash them white—clean from every stain of sin? The Bible answers: "These are they which . . . have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."—Exchange

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—It is quite a long time since we have had a contribution from one of our Cozy Corner story writers, and I know you will be much interested in reading the following little temperance story by a Jackson, Mich., temperance girl, eleven years old:

AN AWAKENING.

Little Edith was a bright little temperance girl of six years, but her heart was easily touched by sad scenes, and she spent many tearful hours, though her home was lovely enough to make any little boy or girl happy. The beautiful river Hudson flowed calmly by, and above the tall trees that nodded their drowsy heads over the river rose the lofty peaks of the Catskill mountains. Her home was a neat, white, cheerful cottage, that stood not far from the woods.

Her parents were what the people now called good, honest people, but her father had been, not less than three years ago, a poor drunken man, who had been rescued by the beautiful words of God, and he soon developed into a splendid miller.

Edith was in the habit of taking her father's dinner daily to the mill, but on the occasion of my story, she started earlier than usual. When she had gotten about half way, she saw a poor man lying at the foot of a tree, apparently drunk. She hurried on to tell her father what she had seen, the story of which brought tears to the good man's eyes to think he had once been in this condition, but had been saved.

She had heard of drunken men being saved by the singing of a hymn, so she resolved to do this and try to rescue the man. It did not take very long for her to reach the spot where he lay. She stepped quite out of sight, and began singing the hymn, "Out of Darkness into Light." It was evident that the man paid no attention to her singing until she came to the part, "All thy talents we have wasted, all thy laws disobeyed."

After the little girl had finished her singing the poor man arose and went to his miserable hut, where he sat down to think what these words meant. He thought of ever so many meanings, but none suited him until he found out the true meaning, and he decided not to drink any more, but to obey God. Thus this poor man was brought to walk in the "Path of Light."

SUSIE ELNORA SMITH.

This little story calls to mind the Bible words, "And a little child shall lead them." It is true, dear children, that you can help and are helping every day by your example and your faith to lead others into the ways of righteousness and peace.

Yours, to improve every opportunity,

Aunt Jane

SIGNAL NOTES... 16

THE WORLD'S PETITION.

A petition already twelve miles long, signed in nearly fifty languages, by representative men and women of all nations, praying that the governments of the world extend to the homes and the home-keepers of their respective domains, protection from the twin curses of civilization, alcohol and opium! It is a conception worthy of the great humanizing and harmonizing power from which it emanated; worthy the heart and brain of Christian motherhood!

The World's Petition is the climax of the anti-saloon movement. It is interesting to note its evolution. First is born the desire for the security of the individual family. The hand which rocks the cradle is lifted in protest against that which menaces the safety and happiness of the home—protest, alas! unheeded. Then the world witnesses the novel spectacle of mothers brought to bay in defense of their homes, marching from church doors in solid phalanx against the destroyer. The anti-saloon crusade once inaugurated, the mother-heart grows broader and bolder. "Not my home alone," it says, "but the state, the nation, the larger home must be protected." And so petitions pour into legislature and into Congress, praying the country's defenders and law-makers to shield the homes of America from the ravages of the rum power.

Undaunted persistence is a proverbial trait of the W. C. T. U. women, and if their petitions are slightingly received it only spurs them to greater effort. The home-protection idea goes on expanding, the W. C. T. U. heart grows bigger, until at last it is big enough and strong enough to contain the whole earth. Like John Wesley's parish, the family of the W. C. T. U. includes the entire world, and the nations' mothers become federated in a common cause—the overthrow of a common enemy.

The Polyglot Petition is one of the natural outcomes of such federation, and signifies, as do state and national petitions, the beginning of a constantly increasing pressure to be brought to bear upon rulers and legislators in the various lines of temperance work.

Of all W. C. T. U. interests, the claims of this petition are just now the most pressing, and we appeal to our readers to give it prompt and earnest attention. We urge every local union to call for the concentrated effort which our women ever stand ready to make in time of necessity.

There remain but a few weeks in which to circulate the petition. The first of May or thereabouts it is to be called in and presented, and this mammoth document will form one of the noteworthy exhibits of woman's faith and work at the Columbian Exposition.

We would that every individual man and woman who desires greater security for the home against the saloon could realize the value of the aid it is in their power to render to God and Home and Humanity by securing names to this petition.

It need not take very much of any one person's time. The busiest man or woman may secure a few names. A copy of the petition lying on the office desk or on the parlor table, a few words calling attention to and in commendation of its object, are often all that is necessary to obtain many a signature. It is really surprising as well as encouraging to see how readily people sign when it is thus personally brought to their notice.

If we of America do not make strenuous effort during the next few weeks to add to our list of names, there is danger of this nation making proportionately the poorest showing of all on this polyglot roll of honor. Considering the position our country holds as the leading republic of the world, this thing ought not so to be. Let us see to it, sisters and brothers, that America occupies a place well toward the van in the grand procession.

We suggest that wherever practicable, the local unions secure the publication of the petition (a copy of which will be found on page 12 of this issue and can also be secured in regular form with instructions for circulating from Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Ravenna, Ohio,) in the local paper or papers calling attention to it in an explanatory paragraph, and giving notice that its readers will be furnished an opportunity to sign the same.

This method prepares the way for the circulators, and saves much time in individual explanations. Where the local editors are friendly to the work it would be well to keep the notice in the paper for a week or two, or until the community had been thoroughly "done" by the canvassers.

It will be found that the Loyal Temperance Legions take hold of this work heartily; and that the boys and girls are eminently successful as petitioners for the petition. A word to the Y's will, no doubt, be sufficient to enlist their most valuable services also. Secure the aid of pastors, of Sunday-school superintendents, of public school-teachers and of college faculties; make use of religious meetings, church socials and literary circles; and in the varied methods which will suggest themselves to every white ribboner make every effort count in the five or six weeks of opportunity that remain.

This twelve mile stretch of canvas—the longest and most representative petition the world has ever seen—will be a most impressive object lesson to the representative people of all nations who congregate at the World's Fair. It will serve as an eye-opener and a thought awakener, not only for the governors to whom it is addressed, but for the governed also, and it will be no light thing for the world's rulers to ignore this expression of the will of the people presented under such circumstances, even though the petitioners are of the "weaker" sex. Every name enrolled thereon represents an integrant part of that power which is surely and ceaslessly making for righteousness and for universal brotherhood.

The word of the Lord to Christian womanhood is embodied in this petition, and we rest in the promise that "my word shall not return unto me void, but shall accomplish that whereunto it is sent." Whatever the visible result, the seed sown by the circulation, the presentation and the exhibition of the World's W. C. T. U. petition, cannot fail to bring forth much fruit.

May it be said of every W. C. T. U. woman that in this matter "she hath done what she could."

WOMAN'S MAGNA CHARTA.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton in a letter to the Woman's Journal in which she defends the action of the Woman's Suffrage Convention in passing a resolution in favor of the Sunday opening of the fair says: "Thirty years more of experience may teach women that there is an intimate connection between their subject condition and the popular theology, and that they have a far deeper reason than man has for striving to preserve the secular nature of our government."

Mrs. Stanton is doubtless right in believing that there is "an intimate connection between the subject condition of women and the popular theology," but she makes one vital mistake, a mistake made by abolitionists fifty years ago, and many other times in the history of Christian civilization and that is in supposing that the "popular theology" on the subject in dispute is the theology of Christ and the Bible. Man-made theology taught that slavery was divine in its origin and the same kind of theology teaches the subordination of women. But all the while it was the principles of Christ which were rousing the world against the crime of slavery and the same principles are bursting the fetters of woman's bondage.

The same great error of mistaking the teachings of men for the teachings of the Bible caused the imaginary conflict between science and the Bible. But it was what men supposed the Bible taught, not what it really did teach that conflicted with the newly discovered facts of science. No intelligent person, either Christian or anti-Christian, now thinks that the Bible teaches that the world is flat or that the sun, moon, planets and fixed stars revolve around it. Of late years anti-Bible scientists have tried to antagonize the Bible and science but they have not been able to prove a single contradiction between the teachings of the Bible and any established fact of science.

In the future as in the past, Christians will doubtless make mistakes in applying Christ's principles to specific questions, nevertheless the reformer who antagonizes the Bible and Christian workers antagonizes the only real forces which are working in His favor.

The world has developed far enough to establish the fact that every genuine reform is founded upon the teachings of Christ; no movement contrary to them has ever stood. Ours is not a Christian civilization in the sense that it fulfills the requirements of the principles which Christ taught. It is a Christian civilization in the great and blessed sense that it is the power of His life within which is expanding to the perfect ideal that he holds before us.

He who cannot see what Christianity has already done for woman, who cannot see that the principles of Christ are on the side of woman's emancipation and that Christian workers are rapidly taking their places on the same side of the contest, is "blind and cannot see afar off." Christians are the last ones who desire to unite in the least degree church and state, but the preservation of our Sabbath is not a step in that direction. The opening of the Fair on Sunday is a blow at our American Sabbath, and through it a blow at our Christianity itself, and woman has certainly at least as deep a reason as man has for preserving what has been thus far the very magna charta of her liberties.

AMONG PHILLIPS BROOKS' SERMONS.

So many white-ribboners are readers of Phillips Brooks' sermons that at many special requests, we have prepared a brief analysis of a few leading ones:

The themes and the texts of Phillips Brooks' sermons are strikingly co-ordinated, and furnish unique foundations for the spirituality of his thought and the originality of development. Some of these are: "Curse ye Meroz," (The Curse of Uselessness); "Make the men sit down," (The Need of Receptivity); "The sea of glass mingled with fire," (Repose and Struggle); "The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal," (The Symmetry of Life); "The man with two talents," (Blessings and Responsibilities of the Average Man); "And when the burnt offering began, the song of the Lord began also with the trumpets," (The Joy of Self-sacrifice); "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now?" (The Withheld Completions of Life); "It is written, Thou shalt not live by bread alone," (The Food of Man); "That we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God," (The Purpose and Use of Comfort). There are no formal divisions of the subject of a discourse. Rare analytical power is there, but the framework of the thought is embedded in expression and illustration as the bones of the body are clothed with flesh and blood; it does not sit staring on the outside.

In the sermon on "The Symmetry of Life," the mystic city seen by St. John in vision as the New Jerusalem coming down out of heaven, with the length, the breadth and the height of it equal, is taken as a type of glorified humanity, rich and full and strong all round, the ideal human life. The length is not the duration of life, but its forward push, the energy with which it seeks its rightful ends. The breadth is its lateral outreach, the tendency which draws a man out into sympathy with other men. And the height of a life is its upward reach toward God.

"While Peter thought upon the vision, the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee." These words are the foundation for a discourse on visions and tasks. Man is forever standing between his visions and his tasks. To every man there comes a Peter-hour,—a time when his visions meet his work. There is a world of truths on one side and a world of men on the other. We must not tarry in the housetop of vision while the men who need us are knocking at the door. The practical life is needed to complete the meditative life. Peter plodding over the dusty hills to reach Cornelius may seem to have lost the glory which was on his face while he sat and thought upon the vision and caught glimpses of the essential nobleness of man, but the vision was at the soul of his journey all the same.

In the discourse on the Joy of Self-sacrifice, the giving up of the life of man to serve his true and rightful Master, the surrender of his life to another, is self-sacrifice typified by the burnt-offerings. Can the life be offered now, as the life of the beast was offered of old, with song and trumpet? The soul that trifles with self-sacrifice can never get its true joy and power. Only the soul that with an overwhelming impulse and a perfect trust gives itself up forever, finds the delight and peace which such complete self-surrender has to give.

Rich men, who, with all their wealth, are weary and wretched; learned men, whose learning only makes them querulous and jealous; believing men, whose faith is always souring into bigotry and envy—every man knows what these men need; just something which shall make them let themselves go out into the open ocean of a complete self-sacrifice. They are rubbing and fretting and chafing themselves against the wharves of their own interests, to which they are tied. Sometime or other a great slow, quiet tide, or a great, strong, furious storm must come and break every rope that binds them and carry them clear out to sea, and then they will know the true joy for which a man was made. Only the trust to the great ocean must be complete. No trial trip will do. No ship can tempt the sea, and learn its glory so long as she goes moored by any rope, however long, by which she means to be drawn back again if the sea grows too rough. "With the song of the Lord and with trumpets" the man must go out from his selfishness into the joy of self-sacrifice.

Years ago, in his lectures on the "Influence of Jesus," Phillips Brooks gave at once his own apprehension of the noblest life our earth has seen, and his own ideal. He considered the influence of Jesus in its four-fold unity: Moral, social, emotional and intellectual. Like his Divine Master, he never separated these elements; like Him, he found the solution in God, and he understood the Father in the Son. The answer to all his questionings, spoken by divine lips, he has left us on the last page of that volume, and it comes to us with a new solemnity now that the voice which uttered them has been touched by the eternal silence.

"Have I been so long with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

WHERE SHALL WE FIND SPECIAL WORKERS?

Not by levying a draft upon the home women, to the neglect of those duties, which if performed with reverence and intelligence, will help humanity as no other efforts can.

It is the glory of the women's temperance movement that no "Mrs. Jellaby" has yet been attracted to our ranks. But while the beloved home-makers and home-keepers give us scraps and fragments of their time, finding in our unions a nobler form of social interchange than in the ceremonious calls and visits of the olden time—these scraps and fragments can be braided together into coherent form by the steady fingers and deft skill of the once "anxious and aimless,"' but now cheery and efficient class which we name "our Protestant nuns."

Thousands once called "spinsters," because society had found nothing for them to do but spin; thousands more, whom death, or that death-in-life called dissipation, has bereft of their strong staff and beautiful rod; and yet other thousands, who, when their nest was left unto them desolate because the birds were fledged and flown, once sat with folded hands through life's long afternoon, are now finding a place where their activities exactly fit into the varied and musical machinery of our beautiful and blessed work. To empty-hearted young women in homes of luxury, our unions come with loving invitations; to the dormant talent of Christ's church the call is "Arise, ye who are at ease in Zion; hear my voice ye careless daughters;" to the overcrowded ranks of teacherdom (and here we can speak out of long experience) the invitation is, "Come with us; we need each other." Hard as our work is, a teacher's occupation is harder. Though we could point you to a score of women in our work who speak on an average once a day all the year round, who organize, write and travel without respite, and nearly all of whom were teachers once, their concurrent testimony would be that they are stronger, healthier, and in better spirits than ever in their lives before. The breezy life, the tonic of change, the inspiration of variety have much to do with this. Moreover, if one is in earnest, and has something to say, the average audience need have no terrors for a woman who can instruct and hold the interest of a high-class school. Indeed the former requires more stress of nerve, for your class instinctively matches its united intellectual vigor against its teacher and is full of questionings; while an audience is in receptive rather than combative mood, is also to the last degree good-natured and cannot answer back.

Let the voice of invitation go forth, then, to the teachers and the young women in our colleges, certifying to them that in delightful service for Christ a new vocation is open to the persuaders of the race. Nor do we hesitate to predict the day as not far distant when we shall have scores of educated women, where we now have one, engaged in the sure and steady occupation of educating and refining public sentiment, with voice and pen, against the use of poisonous beverages. Fields are waiting for them in half a dozen states to-day, as we know, by urgent applications from leading officers. They will be welcomed and beloved, the sisters of all homes, societies, and people, for their work's sake. Custom's pinched lips have ceased to mutter their tyrannical "Thus far, no farther," which in less Christian centuries checked the buoyant steps of woman, and God's loving "Thus far, no farther," written in our nature, asserts its kindly sway.

STOP MAKING AND SELLING CIGARETTES.

The above is the heading of an editorial in the Chicago Tribune for February 19, which strongly urges the Illinois General Assembly to pass a bill prohibiting the manufacture and sale of cigarettes in this state. We quote a paragraph:

"Those vile compounds called cigarettes are poisonous, and should be outlawed. They are not safe for men to use. They are rank poison for the juniors.

"There is but one way to deal with this evil, and that is the radical one. As long as cigarettes are offered for sale in nearly every street, boys will manage to get them. Therefore their sale should be forbidden altogether. None should be allowed to be made in the state, and no store should be permitted to keep them. Then it would be extremely difficult for boys to get these opium-soaked abominations, and they would be kept from acquiring an appetite for one of the most destructive of drugs."

We always rejoice when we find any ground of agreement between ourselves and others, and we can give the above our heartiest commendation. But the question which proves too great for our feminine logic is, why when we substitute for "the vile compounds called cigarettes" the vile compounds of the liquor traffic and urge with respect to them "there is but one way to deal with this evil, and that is the radical one," "that there sale should be forbidden," "none should be allowed to be made in the state," etc., the suggestion becomes impractical, a gross violation of personal liberty, and altogether, from every point of view, dangerous, absurd and unreasonable.

Miss Willard writes under recent date concerning the hero, Gen. Gordon: "I have had the pleasure of talking with Miss Rachel Gurney, of London, about that great man and Christian, General Gordon, who perished at Khartoom. Miss Gurney was a member of the party with which General Gordon went to Palestine, and she says that if ever a saint lived he was one. She describes him as of panther-like figure in respect of that sinewy and symmetrical build that has neither too little nor too much materiality. His movements were most alert and yet perfectly self-poised. His eyes were blue, and of a rare child-like expression; they seemed to be always asking for the truth, and ready to render the truth to every comer. They looked straight into yours, and looked up often, for it seemed as if the tides of the life of God flowed into this man's brain and heart. He had not an atom of pretension. Simplicity of manner, look and language were striking characteristics. He wished to learn from every body, and did not put the humblest at a distance, but in spite of this great characteristic, which was simply nothing more nor less than humanity in action, it was impossible for him to be in any group of persons, even for a few months, without being its center. Persons formed in circles around him like iron pilings around a magnet, and to each and to every one he gave that clear, incisive glance, and that firm, kind hand of help. There was not a particle of cant in his composition, but there was a strain of fanaticism. For instance, to him the mysteries of our religion were visualized in the outward observances instituted by the church. These were not technical, but living to his mind, and in their observance he found growth to his spirit. The city of Jerusalem he thought to be made on the plan of the form of a human being, with the heart at the point where the crucifixion took place. The wailing place of the Jews he considered symbolic, because in standing there to bemoan themselves they were facing the two centers of the greatest Christian ordinances, viz., the point where stood the baptismal laver in the Temple, and the room where the Lord's supper was instituted. Of course, to us these views are fanciful, but to him they were no less than inspirations. Miss Gurney had letters from him while he was in Khartoom. He had interested himself in the doing away with the slave trade, and he regarded his last mission as centered in that purpose. He said, 'Nothing is wrought out for man except through blood,' and seemed to have some prescience of his coming doom. He undoubtedly passed through a Gethsemane while waiting for the English troops. If they had been two days earlier they would have saved that great life and carried out its holy purpose."

A wooden bowl is soon turned on the lathe, but the making of a golden bowl, which must be beaten and burnished, is quite another thing.

We are indebted to the Congregationalist for this bit of humor: "It is said that there is a tribe in Africa where speakers in public debate are required to stand on one leg, and are not allowed to speak longer than they can stand in that position. With all our boasted civilization, we discover every now and then points in which savages surpass us."

One of our English comrades writes:—"How strange it is that some people are so slow to grasp the meaning that white-ribbon women, or white-ribboners, is the term internationally given to all women belonging to the forty federated national associations of temperance women. It needs some tuneful harp constantly to play the song, 'There are bands of white ribbon around the world.' This is simply the poetic way of putting it, that forty or more federated national associations form the international federation of women the world over, and that the badge is a knot of white ribbon, and that the name of the association thus formed is the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Yours in the union, and for the freedom of women everywhere."

For a name that epitomizes the whole scope of a society, commend me to the U. C. P. D. N. R. L. T., lately organized in London; in full, the United Committee for the Prevention of the Demoralization of the Native Races by the Liquor Traffic.

Our good friend, Joseph Cook, of Boston, whose forceful features are portrayed above the second of a series of "mental photograph" questions propounded in an Eastern journal, gives the following characteristic answers to some of these queries:

My favorite book....The one most inspired from on High.

What I enjoy most....Triumph of light and right.

What I detest most....Opposition to light and right.

The quality which I admire most in men....Size and symmetry of soul. Loyalty to conscience.

The quality which I admire most in women....Size and symmetry of soul. Loyalty to conscience.

My motto....Let us strike home, for we are going Home!

The folding-bed is a modern invention, not to be despised for convenience and adaptability. But even the best of people and things have their faults and are apt to become fractious at times. A story is told of the encounter of Stanley, the African explorer, with one of these patent economizers of space, on which he had chosen to sleep, because, as he said, it seemed more like "camping out." But his feelings underwent a complete revulsion when the next morning, in a kindly attempt to investigate the cause of its unwarranted refusal to close, the recalcitrant thing flew up with sudden vengeance, catching his head in such a way that he was extricated with great difficulty. "Talk about death in the jungles," said he, afterward, "I never saw death staring me more closely in the face than inside that folding bed."

Dear On Duty:—I've been thinking. "Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, etc." (See page one, Union Signal.) I think if "we women" would learn the difference between our needs and our wants, between what we must have to meet the demands of life in its truest sense, there would be many a penny dropping into the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U. I may need gloves—I am accustomed to them—I want them—but I may economize greatly in the purchase of the same. I may be "accustomed" to perfume on my handkerchief, fresh flowers on my table, dainty confections in my pretty bonboniere—do I really need them? Need I buy that piece of lace? Are those expensive slippers essential to my best development? Is the coveted Easter bonnet a requisite to holiness and the commemoration of our Lord's resurrection? Ah, no! But—the world does need Christ, and there are none but the world's citizens to preach Christ. His cause needs money, and He has no money save yours and mine! "Think on these things." On Duty.

MISSOURI.

"Hand in hand with angels!
Blessed so to be!
Helped are all the helpers,
Giving light they see
He who aids another
Strengthens more than one."

Work in this state has been greatly strengthened by the coming of Miss Jennie Smith, our National railroad evangelist, at Liberty Street church, Kansas City, located in the vicinity of the Union depot, the stock yards, packing and ware houses of the west bottoms. She has conducted four meetings daily with marked results, the noon meeting alternating between the car-shops, stock exchange and the Union depot. It is reported that from one to three hundred have been converted. One of the converts had not attended any church in twenty-five years.

On the Sabbath, immense mass-meetings were held in the auditorium. Services were also conducted by this Christ-like worker in Summit Street church, and many other churches were open to her. The clergy were interested and gave her their coöperation.

Kansas City has organized a "union of unions" that will meet monthly to council on the best methods of extending and forwarding work in the city. This "union of unions" has adopted a constitution and elected officers and there is much to hope that excellent results will follow. The district president, Mrs. A. Hanly, is energetically pushing the work and many new department superintendents have been chosen.

A protest against the social evil bill, now before the legislature, is being circulated by indignant W. C. T. U. women of the city, also one to be presented to the police commissioner against "the policy shops" where women and children gamble away their small earnings.

A very enjoyable parlor meeting was held by Z. Wallace union at which Mrs. Hoffman gave one of her enthusiastic addresses and ten new members were added to the list of workers. And thus much work is being done in Kansas City.

St. Joseph was encouraged by the coming of our own state president not long since, who gave one of her incomparable lectures in that city. Central union has well furnished, comfortable headquarters in which regular meetings are held. The parlor meetings are held frequently and are always largely attended. These meetings are held in the homes of those who are not members as well as in the homes of W. C. T. U. women who are friendly to us and the great cause for which we are laboring.

The press of the city are very friendly and solicit items of interest. Thus the readers of the daily papers and one weekly are kept in touch with the "white-ribbon gospel."

Many other unions might avail themselves of the power of the press if they would select a never failing and prompt superintendent of this work. Some gospel temperance meetings have been held, also mothers' meetings and chalk-talks. Their evangelistic work is in the hands of an efficient superintendent. A goodly number of copies of THE UNION SIGNAL, Missouri Home Guard, The Voice and other temperance papers are taken, and temperance literature is distributed. Two colored unions are located here, and are, we trust, doing good. A petition has been circulated and placed in the hands of the police commissioners, asking that a police matron be appointed. At the annual business meeting of the city council it is expected that an appropriation will be made for this purpose, and that St. Joseph, like many other cities, will have a police matron.

Through the efforts and lectures of Mrs. Louise Rounds, Carthage has been blessed. Excellent Bible readings are held with our state evangelist as leader. One meeting in each month is devoted to the study of the state minutes and what is required of each superintendent. Three Demorest medal contests have been held; two of them were held at the home of Mrs. J. Hall. She and her daughter, Maggie, gathered up the neighboring children and invited them and all others residing in this portion of the city. These have proved very excellent entertainments. Through the efforts of Mrs. S. H. King another contest was held in the college. The president of this, the twenty-second district, is arranging to hold a school of methods in each one of the counties located therein.

Memphis union has been enjoying a steady growth, largely due to social gatherings. Twelve new recruits were enrolled at a parlor meeting, when neatly written invitations were sent out to over a hundred members and guests. An interesting program was prepared, and a contribution basket placed on a table in the room was found to contain over ten dollars. May other unions go and do likewise.

Chillicothe has been highly entertained with good speakers. Col. John Sobieski gave three of his ever original, amusing and characteristic lectures, one to the students of the Normal school and two at the Opera House, to immense audiences. Our leader, Mrs. Clara Hoffman, pleased every listener when she lectured at this city, and nine new members were added to the union, as well as the collection of fifteen dollars, which helped to replenish the treasury.

Work in the thirtieth district is now in the hands of Miss Carrie L. Carter, as president, and the secretaries and treasurer have been appointed. Bloomfield union gave an "observation social," that was very interesting and instructive. Charleston has just held its third Demorest medal contest. Dexter union gave a poverty social, which was very enjoyable, and thus

"Men may come and men may go,
But we go on forever."

The Hoo Nan reception, given at Holden, was a brilliant success. The hall was gay with booths, which were presided over by a bevy of pretty girls, attired in Japanese costumes, and illuminated with Japanese lanterns. The china booth, where girls disposed of exquisite ware, the fruit booth and the Japanese tea table were all well patronized. A number of stereopticon views of Japanese scenery completed the attractions of a pleasant evening in Japan. The net proceeds of the evening were $18.15.

The president of the tenth district lectured and organized a new union at Foristell. She has also held several meetings, with good results, in Lincoln county. Parliamentary drills have been conducted, and much educational work is being done in the district.

Suffrage petitions are being circulated, and legislators are receiving enthusiastic letters that they may know we expect some legislation in our behalf.

Tarkio enjoyed a parlor social, held at their headquarters. A literary program was furnished by the L. T. L., which has over one hundred members. Light refreshments were served, and the proceeds of the evening were over thirteen dollars.

MRS. MARY E. JONES,
State Reporter, Humansville

NEW HAMPSHIRE NEWS.

The February number of the Granite State Outlook contains a letter from our former state president, Mrs. Janette H. Knox, now of Wahpeton, N. D., which all who have known Mrs. Knox will wish to read. She says that she was teaching the day of our Laconia state convention but her thoughts were with us, and the telegram of greeting, sent her that day, gave her great pleasure. Of the birthday book which was passed around at the convention and sent to her later she says, "Blessings on the head of her who thought to do so generous a deed; every name in it brings me memories of the past that are sacred. I cannot tell you how many times I have turned its pages to look upon the familiar hand writing and to read the familiar names of of those I love so well." The same number contains two poems, souvenirs of the trip to Colorado convention, both pleasing and amusing.

Mr. Edward Dowley has been making a trip through the state with a view to forming "Sons of Temperance." He formed a league at Bristol. It is hard to make much headway in the midst of a crowd of rough, aimless young men, whose principal occupation is to sit around the village store and spit tobacco juice at a crack in the floor, or smoke the old clay pipe, ready at the least warning to make sport of any attempt at better things. I think there is as great a work to be done in our country villages as in the streets of our large cities. In many cases the home where they are lodged, clothed and fed by indulgent parents proves a boy's curse rather than his blessing. It takes away the need of work for self-support and trains them to a life of shiftlessness, aimlessness and makes of them a blot upon the good name of manliness.

The county temperance association met in Hampton last month. The subjects were, "Tobacco and its effects," by Professor Joseph Kimball, "Prohibition, what it means," by Rev. J. W. Bean, "Relation of the saloon to the business interests of the community," Rev. W. P. Chancy, "How I was saved," Rev. H. E. Shattuck. The W. C. T. U. of Hampton, deserves honorable mention; it is active in many ways. During the last year it has had several successful contests.

A new Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been organized at Claremont, Miss Florence Whitney, president, Miss Helen Bates, corresponding secretary. Mrs. Gleason was there to assist them.

Mr. W. J. Demorest has just sent our state superintendent five hundred more books for speaking contests and twenty-five medals. We can now have a grand gold medal contests in each county and a diamond one at our next state convention.

Our county president (in Merrimack) writes me that she is busy receiving signed petitions to be presented to the legislature at once. Miss Wendall, our state president, will accompany her before the house.

Especial interest should be manifested to increase the circulation of our state paper, the Granite State Outlook. It should be taken by every W. C. T. U. member, even if she has to earn the twenty-five cents to pay for it. It is not only her pleasure but her duty. Now let all delinquents send their names and money to Exeter, N. H., and have their names upon the subscription list.

Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason spent two weeks in the eastern part of the state under the direction of Miss C. R. Wendall. She visited Centre Ossipee, Wolfborough, Milton, East Rochester, Rochester, Strafford Corner, Gilmanton Iron Works and Alton, giving an address and holding a woman's meeting in each place. She also attended the Strafford county convention at Great Falls. This trip was planned with a three-fold object, to arouse public sentiment, to strengthen the unions and to secure funds for the Mercy Home, and, as far as we can judge, it has been successful in all. Financially the result was greater than was expected, one hundred and twenty-four dollars being the receipts after the expenses (which were taken from collections) were paid. About half the amount was from the surplus of the collections and will be used for the running expenses of the Mercy Home, while the rest, which was secured by donations as a result of Mrs. Gleason's efforts will go toward paying for the lands, funds being much needed for that purpose. Mrs. Gleason contributed five dollars.

I now have the particulars of Miss Ella H. Pearson's trip in behalf of the Loyal Temperance Legion, which I am sure will be of interest to all who long for the good of our coming generation. She spoke Sunday afternoon at Franklin and at Franklin Falls in the evening, with a good audience both times. The children were unusually bright, though one or two of their answers amused the listeners, and carried the idea that to have a woman upon the platform could mean only woman suffrage. In answer to Miss Pearson's question, "Who will be the voters in ten or twelve years?" the answer came clear and strong, "The women." "Won't there be others?" From the same source, in the same positive manner, "No." It is planned to have an L. T. L. there soon.

At East Andover the boys came out in round numbers, considering the intense cold. One girl, brave and zealous, was there. It is a small place, and there are but very few girls. It is to be hoped than an organization may be the result of this chalk-talk. Hopkinton was next visited. Here I think the children would take hold to form a legion if there were older ones to carry the heavy end of the beam. Public sentiment is not yet fairly aroused, and in many cases the parents refuse to let their children take an active part in the temperance work. A few autograph pledge cards have been sent from this town.

At Epsom, Miss Pearson gathered her little flock of L. T. L's about her, feeling at last as though she was speaking to real live boys and girls, up and ready for work. They sang the welcome song to her, and many other pieces from their marching song book. The evening was very enjoyable, giving our state superintendent of this juvenile work a glimpse of what a band of bright children can do. They have sent antograph cards and funds for the Willard fountain.

The weather all this time was bitter cold, but at Canterbury she had a church well filled with children and young people. They flocked round her after the meeting to know when they could organize and thanking her for her talk and drawings. It is the intention of Canterbury people to organize an L. T. L. in the spring.

The next evening was at Bow, where she met the flourishing young L. T. L. Some of the older ones are studying for the L. T. L. diploma. She spoke to them in the evening, and upon Saturday returned home, praying that great good might come of the week's work.

NORTH CAROLINA NOTES.

North Carolina is moving steadily forward. The National Convention, however, wrought us a great loss, for our secretary of Y. W. C. T. U. work, Miss Ida Vail, of Charlotte, N. C., was married January 31, to the Rev. C. M. Johnson, of Denver, pastor of the Twenty-third Avenue Presbyterian church, in whose church Miss Vail spoke when at Denver. The couple left the same evening for Cuba, stopping at Savannah and St. Augustine to return to Denver via Galveston. Mr. Johnson is under lasting obligations to the National Convention for convening at Denver, and wore at his wedding a knot of white ribbon.

The Y's in North Carolina are sorely bereft, and send in pitiful appeals for some one to lead forward the Y work.

Our state treasurer has been most successfully engaged four months in missionary work in the mountains where she gave Bible readings, conducted song services and gospel temperance work. We are rejoiced to have her at headquarters again.

The corresponding secretary is full of duties, only now and then finding time to speak for the unions. The local unions are leading out in different ways. The Asheville union is erecting a building for a local habitation. All the unions have circulated petitions for signatures, asking the legislature to change our present liquor law so that license to sell shall not be issued without a majority vote of the registered voters. The W. C. T. U. has also a petition before the legislature to raise the age of consent to eighteen years; and another to establish a reform school for juvenile offenders. Of the result of this work, THE UNION SIGNAL will hear later. We are waiting and praying.

The Waynesville union, in the heart of the mountains, is greatly interested in the assembly and school of methods located at Waynesville, and Mrs. Walter, the secretary, and Mrs. Hilliard, the treasurer of this summer assembly, are untiring in their efforts. North Carolina W. C. T. U. is honored in having such women in such a work. The result of their labor will be seen next August.

Mrs. Marriage-Allen, of London, has had a month in North Carolina, visiting public schools and churches among the colored people. She has held a great many public meetings, impressed upon the teachers in the public schools the importance of observing our scientific temperance instruction law. She has distributed vast quantities of leaflets and introduced daily Bible readings. Among the colored people she administers the pledge in a most impressive manner as a religious rite. To this total abstinence pledge Mrs. Allen has taken over 700 signatures in her tour across the state. On her return trip she will visit some new points and give a new impetus to the temperance work. She returns to England before the warm weather.

Workers from other states have settled in new districts and are opening the way for work for which we give thanks. Miss Burnett, of Ohio, is at Tryon and Mrs. Rosa B. Dorman, of Michigan, is at Southport.

BITS FROM THE WORKSHOPS.

In spite of rain and snow and mud and bad weather in general, quite a goodly number of letters from different parts of the state have reached my desk, telling of good work being done for the Master in many places.

Harriman, one of the first among good working unions, sends in the first report. They started in the winter with a new constitution and by-laws which have proved very satisfactory. They have had one lecture since state convention. Then they had Mrs. Snell, of Mississippi, with them for two weeks in a series of evangelical meetings. They received a spiritual uplift from those meetings which will long be felt. About one hundred conversions are reported as a result of her labors there. All the ministers in the place coöperated with her in the work, and acknowledged personal spiritual benefit.

Their L. T. L. is one of the best in the state. They held, some weeks since, an apron sale which netted them about $75. They also gave a pumpkin pie social which was quite a success. They (the L. T. L.) have recently purchased a splendid piano.

The union gave a supper in the temple, December 30, which netted them twenty-five dollars, and had a yarn sociable recently, which netted them seven dollars. They have circulated petitions to the legislature for a scientific temperance instruction law, for a law raising the age of protection of girls to eighteen years, and some others. Their press department is doing splendid work, keeping up a weekly column in the Advance. They hope to extend it soon, getting the use of a column in their other papers.

Maryville reports two excellent temperance lectures recently, besides one at which a Good Templars' Lodge was organized. All were well attended. They report a wide-awake L. T. L. that meets every other Sunday evening with a splendid class of teachers. They have done good work in circulating petitions to the legislature for the passage of our W. C. T. U. bills.

Mc Minnville and Athens both report good work in circulating petitions to the legislature.

Tullahoma reports a better attendance the past winter than for a year or two previous. They have had several public meetings with good attendance, and have done good work circulating our petitions. Since the state convention they have received the names of nine ladies, new members, and nine gentlemen as honorary members. They held a mothers' meeting, March 1. They have recently appointed a superintendent of evangelistic work.

Friendsville is one of our newer unions, being little more than a year old. But it is a valiant youth and doing a good work. Their meetings are held semi-monthly and two public meetings were held during the year. They have five departments of work: Evangelistic, juvenile, Sabbath observance, mothers' meetings and literature. Their special pride is the juvenile work. They have two L. T. L's, Co. A. of Friendsville, and Co. B. of Hickory Valley, with a membership of about seventy-five in all. The Friendsville L. T. L. has given two entertainments, each time raising about seven dollars for the work. They have received a nice banner and pay all their own expenses. Some bad boys have been reclaimed and make some of the most efficient members of the legion. They keep a well filled rack at the depot. They have a pledge committee, which reports about 125 names to the pledge.

With the coöperation of their state senator and representatives, they have put a petition before the legislature, asking for an amendment to the four-mile law, making it applicable to all towns of less than 500 inhabitants, besides circulating several other petitions.

Two reports have been received from Johnson City. One by the way of the dead letter office, which should have been received months since, and one for their work the past winter. Theirs is a faithful, earnest working union. They have a weekly department in the paper. Mothers' meetings are held every third Wednesday and are very interesting and well attended. They have had sermons preached on Sabbath observance, with special reference to the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday.

An experience meeting was held, and the reports of the members, as to their manner of earning their dollar, is most interesting reading, encouraging to others to go and do likewise. The headquarters have been changed, and they now have a comfortable room on one of the business streets of the town. They have circulated our petitions to the legislature, and several others, and organized a Y of about thirty members at Embreeville, a little mining town near them. Two public entertainments lately were held, an oyster supper and "Aunt Dinah's Husking Bee."

Central, Nashville, reports herself as very much alive. They never miss a meeting, and have added five or six members recently. Fifty dollars were spent the past year in social purity work. They keep up a free kindergarten among the poorest people of the city, with an average attendance of about thirty-three children. Christmas the children of the kindergarten and of a mission school were made happy by presents of candy, nuts and oranges, dolls, etc. They also carried fruits and cakes to the city hospital. They have circulated the petition for the protection of the home, and have a relief committee to look after destitute people.

They recently held a memorial meeting at the residence of Mrs. East, their president, in honor of the departed, Mary Allen West. They had a good program of music, short talks by several ladies, and passed resolutions testifying to Miss West's goodness and worth.

East Nashville union is doing good work. I catch occasional glimpses of this in private correspondence with members of that union, though they have sent in no special report. They have the bills before the legislature in special charge, and look after them early and late. They are very sanguine as to the passage, both of the scientific temperance instruction bill and the bill to raise the age of consent, to at least something more than it is at present, which is ten years.

This latter bill is in the charge of the Hon. W. E. F. Milburn, representative from Greene county, who has all his heart in the measure and is doing every thing in his power to secure its passage. His bill asked to have it raised to eighteen years. But it was recommended for rejection by the judiciary committee, and another substituted raising it to twelve years. When it comes to the final vote, he will make a fight to have it raised to sixteen at least. I do not know if he will succeed, but all good W. C. T. U. women will pray that he may. For as he says, girls need protection more at the age of fifteen or sixteen than at any other time. I hope in my next letter to be able to report success to both our bills, and tell something of the battle for them.

VERMONT.

GLEANINGS SINCE STATE CONVENTION.

At our state convention in September I was appointed state reporter for THE UNION SIGNAL. I am sorry to say I have sent but one report since. I have been waiting for others to report to me, but have decided to wait no longer. I had not been specially interested in "News from the Field" until I became a partner in the firm. I now find much that is helpful and encouraging. I decided long ago that I could not keep house without THE UNION SIGNAL and had learned to love and admire Mary Allen West, and am grieved at the sad going out of her life.

Five months have slipped by since convention. What has been done toward keeping the good resolutions there passed?

Our devoted evangelistic superintendent has sent a circular letter to each local superintendent, to be read before each union, setting forth the three great aims of the evangelistic department: First, The baptism of the Holy Spirit for the workers. Second, The salvation of Christ for the victims of drink. Third, The law of God for the traffic in liquors. Through our state organ she also tells us how to study the Bible and why. How? Search. Why? That we may be completely furnished unto every good work.

In order to influence churches to teach Bible temperance more thoroughly in Sunday-school we accepted the invitation of the state Sunday-school Association to present our cause before that body at their annual convention held at Brattleboro. One of our white-ribbon women prepared and read an essay on "Temperance and the Sunday-school." The subject was discussed from three different standpoints: First, Do we need temperance teaching in the Sunday-school? Second, How shall we teach it? Third, What results have we a right to expect? Teachers were urged to study carefully God's word that they might know His will concerning this great evil—teaching earnestly and prayerfully, expecting God's blessing as a result. If it shall cause even one teacher to be more active and earnest in imparting temperance truth to the young, the labor will not have been in vain.

Mrs. Bell has been busy soliciting funds for the building of the home for friendless women and girls. Thirteen thousand dollars already been pledged.

Our wide awake secretary, Mrs. G. E. Davidson, who is also editor of our state organ, Home Guards is untiring in her efforts to build up and strengthen our cause. Our paper has been enlarged and comes out in a new dress brimful of items of interest to all who love the cause. An effort is being made to make it self-supporting by inducing every member in the state to subscribe for it at the small sum of fifteen cents.

When our new and worthy president, Mrs. Ida H. Read, found herself placed unexpectedly in command of a white-ribbon army, two thousand strong, she naturally desired to make their acquaintance—in other words to inspect her troops to see if they were well trained and disciplined and if she could depend upon them in case of an emergency. Therefore, notwithstanding the unusually severe weather, she has been making a trip through the state, speaking to the ladies in the afternoon, giving a public address in the evening, and also visiting schools with a view to arouse an interest in the preparation of scientific temperance instruction examination papers for the Columbian Exposition.

She met with a warm welcome during the entire trip. Her words fell upon attentive ears and if the lessons she taught can be carried into practical life we shall all be benefited by her coming among us.

Some of her experiences in getting from one appointment to another, however, were anything but pleasant. Twice she was unable to meet her appointments. At one time the train was stalled during a severe storm and passengers were carried on a sled to the nearest hotel for the night.

Never, I think, has there been more earnest effort to enforce our prohibitory law than during the past year. Our legislative superintendent writes, "We have reason to believe the presence of our unions has prevented the opening of new saloons. You cannot reach the rum power by petitions, prayers or resolutions, but prosecute him and you will find that an ounce of law is worth a pound of logic."

One union is trying to raise a hundred dollars for the Temple. Why does not every union do the same?

Several new Y unions and L. T. L's have been organized lately. Let the good work go on. Our hope is in the youth of our land. Let us be encouraged and with Tennyson sing:

Ring out the old, ring in the new.
Ring out the false, ring in the true.
Ring in the valiant man and free.
The larger heart, the kindlier hand
Ring out the darkness of the land
Ring in the Christ that is to be.

COLORADO.

GLEANINGS.

"Sow; for the hours are fleeting,
And the seed must fall to-day."

This spirit seems to pervade the hearts of the workers from the news received from the varied localities.

Colorado Springs is regretting the removal of their president, Miss Helen Dewey to her new home in California, and Mrs. H. E. Balcomb (who has served as recording secretary for the past eight years) was elected in her place. The Woman's Exchange is being well sustained with Mrs. Elsie Chambers as president of the board of managers. Mothers' meetings are held and the churches are lending efficient aid in the gospel services on Sunday evening, the result of the appointment of a committee to wait upon the ministerial association, asking their coöperation. The pastor of the United Presbyterian church chose the theme, "Evangelical work of the W. C. T. U." The meeting at the Baptist church was conducted by the union, when papers were read on "Juvenile work." "Mothers' meetings" and "Fathers' work." The rector of Grace Episcopal church was most cordial, giving part of the Lenten service, and "willing" (as he expressed it) "to let the ladies write his sermon and he will deliver it for them." The Salvation Army united in one service, showing good fellowship and blessed results.

The Larimer county convention held at

strange as it may seem, is caused from a lack of that which is never exactly digested—fat. The greatest fact in connection with appears at this point—it is partly digested fat—and the most weakened digestion is quickly strengthened by it.

The only possible help in Consumption is the arrest of waste and renewal of new, healthy tissue. Scott's Emulsion has done wonders in Consumption just this way.

Loveland, together with the gold medal contest, was a red-letter day for all the participants. The president, Mrs. Tanner, detained at home by illness, was, however, able to send a letter of suggestion and loving remembrance. Papers were read on the "Responsibility of Parents," "Young Woman's Work," "Franchise," "Heroine Reformers," "Hygienic Food." There was a parliamentary drill, and an original poem. The gold medal was awarded to Miss Mamie McCloud, and each of the other contestants received a beautiful book. The recitations were of a high order and showed careful training. Music was furnished by the Choral union and pupils from the public schools, that was exceptional. The cash receipts were seventy-four dollars and thirty-four cents.

Grand Junction union was never so prosperous. The able president, Mrs. Fisk, has aroused new interest in the meetings, and by a little effort they have added a dozen names to the list, making a membership of between thirty-five and forty. They will soon remove to larger rooms, having (in connection with the Y. M. C. A.) rented the old Crawford Hotel, which will give ample space for a reading, reception, and dining-room, etc. They have recently secured an order from the city council for the closing of all gambling rooms and saloons at midnight, and the whole of Sunday. The efficient marshal is endeavoring to carry out this order faithfully, notwithstanding considerable opposition from persons calling themselves temperance people.

The union at Leadville is in deep sympathy with their recording secretary, Mrs. Irene Cole, who is mourning the loss by death of her husband and six months old child, who were laid side by side in one coffin, and suitable resolutions were passed, expressive of their heart-felt sorrow. "Here we part; in heaven we shall find each other again."

Silver medal contests have been held in Rocky Ford and Denver. In the latter city, under the auspices of the Central union, Miss Mamie Sprague, daughter of the district treasurer, received the medal. Her subject was "Nationalism against Sectionalism." The Central Y's rendered two choruses from the popular Y song book. A new interest has been created, and applicants presented themselves for trial at the succeeding one, when the same committee will serve. Miss May Russell, late of Washington City, D. C., won many friends by her able efforts for the success of the contestants.

A new union has been organized in Denver by Mrs. M. A. Cassell, president of Arapahoe county, that has been named the Jennie Smith union, consisting of eighteen members. This union gave a farewell tea to their president, Mrs. Harding, who will change her residence to Albuquerque, N. M., and all are loth to part with so earnest a worker.

Our dear president, Mrs. Higgins, is exercising the same patient, submissive spirit that has characterized her entire illness. While unable to leave her bed, and although hoping against hope, she has planned for a speedy return to her much-loved home, yet "He holdeth the reins in His hands," and God, our Father, will grant this request in His own good time and way. Keep on praying, all ye faithful!

Rev. C. J. Hall, evangelist from New York state, has been holding successful gospel meetings, under the auspices of the different unions; in Longmont, Loveland, Fort Collins, Berthoud and Denver, etc. In the capital city the temperance element and better class of citizens are greatly exercised over the possibility of the repeal by the legislature of the Sunday closing law. Mass-meetings have been held on each Sunday afternoon in the churches. On one Sabbath five meetings were held at the same hour. Resolutions have been endorsed and a petition circulated, trusting to overthrow this power of evil.

A mass-meeting of the ladies of Denver was held at Trinity church for the purpose of considering the feasibility of establishing in Denver a home for fallen women. It was called by the Central Woman's Christian Temperance Union, but fully two-thirds of those present were not members of the organization.

Committees were appointed on constitution and by-laws, finance, permanent organization, one to select a location for the home, one to confer with the King's Daughters and the Christian Endeavor societies, and one to place the subject before the church aid societies.

The plan is to accept the donation of $1,000 offered by Mr. Charles N. Crittenton and by addition of such contributions as may be secured elsewhere, establish a home on the same lines as the Florence Crittenton missions which Mr. Crittenton has established in various cities, and which have done a wonderful work in reclaiming the unfortunates for whom so few friendly doors are open.

"Oh, lead us Lord, that we may lead
The wandering and the wavering feet;
Oh, feed us Lord, that we may feed
Thy hungering ones with manna sweet,
And may we speak with soothing power
To weary ones in needful hour."

PURITY IN LITERATURE AND ART.

To State Presidents, Superintendents and other interested persons:

Two thousand of the annexed blank petitions have been sent to each state and territory. I beg that you will give your immediate attention to the distribution of the same to your county and local superintendents, and urge them to receive the names of individuals and organizations and forward promptly to the address given below without delay, as time for action is at hand.

To the President of the Columbian Exposition, and Prof. Halsey C. Ives, Chief of the Department of Fine Arts, Chicago, Ill:

The undersigned individuals and organizations.....of.....

earnestly petition you for a Pure Art Exhibit at the Columbian Exhibition.

Therefore we protest against nude subjects in marble, plaster, paintings, etc., that appeal only to the sensuous and immoral. The art exhibit will be viewed by hundreds and thousands of young men and women, boys and girls from pure homes. We pray you that the marble casts, paintings, etc., that are displayed will not corrupt the innocent natures of your guests.

W. C. T. U. EXHIBIT AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

To the President of the World's W. C. T. U., and to the Presidents of all National Unions, and all Presidents of State and Territorial Unions in the United States:

DEAR FRIENDS:—The circular letters heretofore sent out were necessarily indefinite, as we could not say exactly what would be required. This one is final and we hope explicit, for what is called for in this circular must be sent in immediately. Every thing should be in hand not later than April first.

The amount of space will not admit of anything like a state exhibit. It can only represent the World's and the various National W. C. T. U's. Therefore you will not be asked to expend either time or money in the preparation of a separate state display.

In order to make our exhibit the best possible under the circumstances we ask the states at once to make the following contribution: We ask each state union to send at least ten dollars, and the abler states are requested to send an additional five dollars. This money will be used simply in fitting up the space with proper furniture and paying the expenses of a competent woman to superintend the work.

Also send fresh copy of state paper, April issue; also, cabinet photos of general officers of all National and World's unions; also photos of National vice-presidents and of National superintendents—all of cabinet size; also the silk American flags used at the Paris Exposition.

In place of souvenir cards a specially prepared issue of the National Leaflet will be provided for distribution.

Finally, all money should be sent, as heretofore, to Miss Esther Pugh, National treasurer, and all articles for the exhibit should be addressed to

E. LOUISE DEMOREST,
Commissioner National W. C. T. U.

PETITION OF THE WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE HOME

Addressed to the Governments of the World.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

NAMES. | RESIDENCES.

We must have one million names this year. Will not men and women, youths and maidens, boys and girls, who love the great cause of home protection, paste this petition on a nice, white sheet of paper and circulate it to the best of their ability, sending the names to Miss Alice E. Briggs, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill.?

ANNOUNCEMENT.

The tenth annual convention of the Florida W. C. T. U. will be held at Pensacola, March 24–27, 1893.

MRS. E. A. HILL, Pres.
MRS. S. J. GLENN, Rec. Sec.

THE sad news of the death of Mrs. Carrie M. Shapleigh, of Denver, which occurred March 5, after a few days' illness, will strike a chord of grief in the heart of white-ribboners everywhere and especially of those who were in attendance at the National W. C. T. U. convention last fall. Mrs. Shapleigh was one of the foremost among the Denver hostesses and was chosen to deliver the address of welcome to the convention in place of Mrs. Eva Higgins, the state president, who was ill. She was widely known in Colorado's temperance and charitable circles and was, at the time of her death, the state treasurer of the W. C. T. U.

WORK IN SOUTH AFRICA.

THE RAILWAY MISSION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The railway mission has been for some time past sending out every month to the different stations along the line, (many of them extremely isolated and cut off from human society) books of instruction and amusement, and they have always endeavored to put in one on temperance work in each parcel, so that the people can see the folly and wickedness of spending so much money in drink. I have obtained from the Temperance League a good stock of books, about three or four pounds' worth, beside what I have expended; these will last for a full year. It would be a great favor if anyone would send temperance periodicals out to us, either to me as president or to Miss Geard, the secretary.

The wine bankers are allowed to have such an influence over our customs that they have prevailed upon them to abolish the excise duty so that the Cape market, cheap before, is cheaper now than ever. A gentleman, a friend of mine, was present at a meeting at Hinterly, when some one got up and said: "Do you wish to have these people destroyed with your drink?" and there was a shout from every part of the room, "Yes! Yes!"

Another night a gentleman friend of mine who was traveling, came to a farm when the men, women and children were being paid, and a girl came out with a bucket of brandy and a tin can and handed out to these men, women and children a can of brandy as part of their wages.

The traders come up the country apparently selling barrels of oil, but amongst them are hidden barrels of brandy. One time, before the traders for brandy left the place, they sat themselves down just outside the territory, and sent in a notice that brandy could there be purchased. The Kaffir chief came in to the Colonial secretary and entreated him to prevent the sale of brandy to his people, as they were so very fond of it and it was ruining them in every way. The secretary replied: "My dear fellow! we cannot prevent such things; teach them moderation."

At the agricultural show, held at Bedford, the white-ribbon ladies themselves put up a temperance booth and supplied refreshments. This not only paid expenses, but left a little over for temperance work.

MRS. MACINTOSH.

Pres. W. C. T. U., Port Elizabeth, Cape Colony.

London, England.

[Mrs. Macintosh recently supplied the above facts as she stopped in London, en route for South Africa. She is very enthusiastic in African work, and avers that the W. C. T. U. is a power in that far-off land, where the helpless natives are being debauched by the worse than heathen customs of Christian nations—the survivals of those Troglodyte days before the dawn of reason, when brute force was noblest power and appetite was law.—EDS.]

IN view of the coming of Self-denial Week, April 3–10, the following suggestions from Marengo, Ill., as to ways and means of earning money for W. C. T. Unions are timely: Making and selling hulled corn, pop-corn, filling ice-cream orders, making candy, jelly, butter, bread, cakes and doughnuts, taking boarders, washing, sweeping, sewing, ironing, picking cucumbers, papering a room, raising chickens or vegetables, knitting, crocheting, speaking to a man another feared to speak to, and so on.

A CHOICE little brochure containing the life of the Rev. Samuel Hibben, husband of our Mrs. Elizabeth Grier Hibben, the well-known Illinois white ribboner, has just appeared. Although written thirty years ago its record of the beautiful life-story of one of the most consecrated and lovely of God's beautiful servants in the ministry is fresh and fascinating to all who seek the life of God in the soul of man. Nothing can exceed the refinement and loving-heartedness of this Presbyterian minister so early called. We rejoice that his only son, the Rev. John Hibben, perpetuates in character and work the merits of his parents—the character and gifts of his father and mother.

TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY HARRIET B. KELLS.

Shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works.—Jas. 2:18.

Mrs. Jane Stapler, of Talequah, Indian Territory, sends $1, the gift of a Cherokee Indian woman, over three score years of age. Seeing a model of the Temple so impressed her with the magnitude of woman's work that her Christian woman's heart yearned to help. Mrs. M. C. Wyant, Seymour, Conn., writes: "Enclosed find $4, the contents of a mite-box for the past year. I have earned most of it in the small sum of fifteen cents a week, and meant it should be $5 by April 1, but being confined to the house since Christmas by sciatic rheumatism, I send the widow's mite, happy that God knows us just as we are. I hope sometime to see the beautiful Temple." One dollar comes from Mrs. A. A. Waite—a pioneer worker in the early struggles of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U.—now seventy-two years old, but anxious to add her mite for the Temple to the unnumbered benefactions of a useful life. Mrs. E. A. Edwards, of Evanston, Ill., generously donates $25 for Temple work.

The In Memoriam touches deeply the sacred places of our souls. Mary J. Reno, of Rochester, Pa., sends $10 in blessed memory of her mother, Mrs. Pamelia Jane Reno, for whom a tablet will be graven. Mrs. M. S. Springstead, of Saybrook, Ill., contributes $1 for the Mary Allen West fountain and asks, "How would it do to have the Red Cross medal presented to her by the Empress of Japan, inlaid in the fountain, if her nearest friends would like it so used?" Mrs. S. E. Cone, of Ottumwa, Ia., sends $1.50 for the Willard memorial. She says: "For six years it has been my great desire to do something for the Temple, but have given it up and now send this little token. I am seventy years old and an invalid for over a year, so my active work for temperance is probably past, but I read THE UNION SIGNAL with interest." Greenville, Mich., W. C. T. U., also sends $2 for Mrs. Willard memorial. Mrs. Elvira Shroder, of Holmesville, Neb., on her seventieth birthday, sends the contents of her mite-box,—and says: "I would like it to go to Mrs. Willard's memorial. I have always said that God would care for her beloved child and he has done it. I trust Miss Willard and our beautiful Temple to His care. I cannot understand how men and women who have taken the solemn vows of the church, and say the Lord's Prayer, can by their influence help high license. I ask every preacher if he is a Prohibitionist; if he is not he can't preach to me. I have long enough heard them preach one way and known them vote another."

In regard to the sentiment of leading preachers toward the coming dedication of the Temple, the following are a few of the many expressions already received. Rev. Charles A. Crane, of Danville, Ill., M. E. First church says: "I watch for it with no fear." Rev. C. M. Chidester, of Central Presbyterian church, Denver, Col., says: "Help those women." Rev. W. Chester, Immanuel Presbyterian church, Milwaukee, Wis., exclaims: "Grand!" Rev. S. O. Royal, of M. E. church, Middletown, O., thinks "it might be called the eighth wonder of the world." Rev. Wallace Macmullen, Springfield, Mass., writes from the M. E. church: "Significant of woman's power and a constantly increasing influence." Grace M. E. church pastor, Rev. J. K. Rader, of Akron, O., says: "It certainly ought to make a profound impression in favor of the holy cause." From the Second Baptist church, Chicago, Ill., comes Rev. Wm. M. Lawrence's testimony: "Most important."

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite-box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

Our Library Table.

MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

THE LITERARY NORTHWEST for March is an anniversary number, celebrating the beginning of its second year. Its bill of fare is attractive and well rewards the one who lingers over it. The make-up of the magazine is first-class, and altogether it bids fair to make no tardy progress toward success.

D. D. Merrill Co., publishers, St. Paul, Minneapolis and New York.

Under the title "A Royal Road to Learn Languages," Mr. Stead gives in the March REVIEW OF REVIEWS, the result of six months' experiment in his own family of four—three boys and one girl—touching M. Gouin's system of teaching French. The examination, or better, the test to which the students were submitted in the presence of competent critics, was a severe one, based upon the ability of the students to think in French, very little opportunity being given for the recitation of any matter that might possibly have been acquired through arbitrary memorizing. The test was satisfactory in results—remarkable in fact—and the reputation of the new system is strengthened not a little by the valuable testimony.

13 Astor Place, New York City.

A particularly timely article appears in the CALIFORNIA ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE for March entitled "The District of Columbia," by Clifford Howard. Taking the reader back to the close of the Revolution, Mr. Howard rehearses the agitation of the question of a permanent location for the government seat, giving a very clear history of its various developments down to the present time. The plan of the city of Washington is detailed with a vivid description of the beauties of the streets and avenues, the parks, names and brief histories of noted statues, location of government buildings, etc., with a sketch of the government of the District. The above named article alone will make this number of the magazine a desirable possession.

California Publishing Co., San Francisco.

The POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY for March contains an article by Edith Sellers, entitled "The Story of a Colony for Epileptics." This colony, known as Bethel, was the outgrowth of the thought of a few philanthropists who realized the burden of those thus afflicted, not only to themselves, but to the community. "Every day epileptics sit with folded hands, brings them the nearer to hopeless idiocy. It is this that renders their fate so infinitely pathetic. Work they must, unless they are to become insane; and there is no work for them to do! Masters do not care to run the risk of employing men who, at any moment may be stricken helpless." With this condition in mind, Bethel, at Sparenberg, near Bielefeld, Germany, was started about a quarter of a century ago, in a humble way, but its fame grew until a colony was formed, where the various classes of patients are kept as happy and employed as congenially as the dread disease will permit. The article states that in England steps are being taken for the purpose of establishing a similar institution.

D. Appleton and Company, New York City.

In SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE for March, William Jewett Tucker contributes a valuable paper on "The Work of the Andover House in Boston." The article is introduced by a discussion of what are termed the lower and the higher philanthropies, the lower philanthropy having meant "the attempt to put right what social conditions had put wrong," the higher philanthropy, which holds the field to-day, means "the attempt to put right the social conditions themselves." Andover House is an outgrowth of the best spirit of the higher philanthropy. To quote from the author: "As far as appears to a transient visitor, the House is simply a home, where a group of educated young men—chiefly, but not necessarily, those who have had a theological training—live, study and work. But the House is organized upon an idea, to which the group is constantly reaching out, each man in harmony with his fellow." This idea embodies certain principles: "The work is altogether personal, and in no sense institutional"—"nothing should be done by the House which can be, or ought to be, done through existing organizations.....The aim is coöperation"—"the avoidance of proselyting"—"the development of the neighborhood from within rather than without." This fourth principle hinges on the fact that the House is established in a neighborhood "chosen with the purpose of attempting to stay the tide of poverty and vice which is flowing in upon it, and of arresting the social disintegration which has already begun." In closing, the author says: "The general movement is a remarkable illustration of the value of the contribution of the personal element, when fully trained and consecrated, to a noble cause."

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City.

Any Woman Will Say So.

It wouldn't make much difference what we said about Dr. Warner's corsets if there were not several hundred thousand women in every part of the community to confirm our statements with "That's so."

The Coraline we use is superior to whalebone and absolutely unbreakable.

What we want is to have you try Dr. Warner's corsets. You'll never wear any other kind.

RESPONSIVE READINGS FOR MARCH.

The discussion of "Temperance Remedies" in the "Responsive Readings for March," is opportune, and will interest many who are honestly inquiring what substitutes may be effectively used for the alcoholic mixtures prescribed by physicians. This subject will be more extensively considered in a pamphlet soon to be issued by the W. T. P. A., entitled "Temperance Remedies."

The Cumberland Presbyterian of this week contains the following, which will be of interest to our readers:

BRIGHT EYES; OR, PLEASURE AND PROFIT FOR SUNDAY AFTERNOON. Arranged by Alice M. Guernsey. Published by Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, The Temple, Chicago, Ill. Price, 50 cents.

This is a sort of album with eighty-four pictures, three on each of the twenty-eight pages. The pictures illustrate Scripture verses, and under each is a word from the verse, and the name of the book of the Bible in which it is found. The object of the book is to afford boys and girls pleasant and profitable employment Sabbath afternoons in searching out the verses that fit these pictures. A useful book for the nursery.

By some oversight, no mention was made in our columns of Current Topics for February. It was a number which ought to be in the hands of all our readers. It contains poems from Will Carleton, M. E. H. Everett and Harold Paget, and articles by Judge Boyesen, Rabbi Hirsch, Hon. Lee Meriwether, J. H. Barrows, D.D., Prof. McClintock, George F. Root and Joseph Edward Raycroft. The novel by Edwin H. Lewis is still running.

The March number is now ready, and is fully equal to the February issue in all respects, and has the extra attraction of a complete story by Charles G. D. Roberts, whose stories have gained a wide reputation, and are eagerly sought after by the leading magazines.

Current Topics at its price, $1 per year, ought to be in every intelligent home. A letter to 1025 Masonic Temple, inclosing $1, will furnish you this valuable and entertaining reading one year.

Are the teachers of vocal culture all on the wrong track? Are their methods all wrong? Mr. E. Davidson Palmer, in the March Musical Messenger says they are. CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

Write to John J. Byrne, Asst. Passenger Traffic Manager, 723 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., if you are interested in California, and he will send you some reading matter.

RAILWAY NOTES.

"The Louisville, New Albany & Chicago has just added to its rolling-stock two new sleeping and boudoir cars, costing nearly $45,000 each. These cars are said to be the finest ever placed on any road in the country, and are specially designed for use during the World's Columbian Exposition."

These cars are models of elegance and beauty, each Compartment or Boudoir being fitted with a complete toilet set, cleverly hidden from view when not in use. They are in daily service between Chicago and Cincinnati, and should be seen and used to be fully appreciated.

All of the Monon's through day trains are made up of new coaches and Parlor and Dining Cars.

Ramey & Co., 85 Dearborn St., Chicago, guarantee that their Medicator and accompanying treatment will cure catarrh and all head and throat troubles, or they will refund the purchase price. Instrument and four months' treatment only $2. Send for testimonials. Agents wanted. See advertisement in another column, and read what the Governor of Indiana says:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Dec. 22, 1892.

Messrs. Ramey & Co.:

GENTLEMEN:—I have used your Medicator with entire satisfaction for colds and slight catarrhal trouble. When used according to directions its effect is immediate, and a cure seems certain.

I shall not travel without it.

Very respectfully yours,
IRA J. CHASE.

Signal Notes.

THE Salvation Army has been ordered to withdraw from Finland.

FROM 1567 to 1888, not a single Italian Bible was printed in Italy.

EIGHTY-ONE per cent of the students at Oberlin college, Ohio, are professing Christians.

STATISTICS show that there is the same proportion of preventable deaths in England among railroad employés as in America.

A BIBLE training-school has been opened in connection with the normal and industrial training-school for colored people at Tuskegee, Ala.

THE entire works of a shingle-mill in Washington were kept running all day on a single cedar tree, from which one hundred and eighty-eight thousand, five hundred shingles were made.

A MINIATURE copy of the famous mosque of St. Sophia is to be erected for the benefit of such Mohammedans as visit the World's Fair in Chicago. A hospital has also been built for the three hundred Turks who are connected with the exhibit.

A GREAT deal of consecrated common sense is included in the reply given by the mother of Phillips Brooks when questioned as to the training of her boys. "There is an age when it is not well to follow or question your boy too closely."

THERE is difference among Catholics in regard to the benefit of parochial schools. A Catholic priest of New York believes with Dr. McGlynn that the religious training should be after school hours. The parochial schools are maintained at great expense.

IT is said that in Hartford, Conn., a man recently applied for a license to kill a man. Naturally, he was refused, and was sent to the insane asylum. What a pity it is that applicants for a license to sell alcohol, which is but a slower way to accomplish the same end, cannot be answered in the same summary way.

"I AM a politician because I am a Christian and the more strenuous the attempts of some to divorce religion and politics, the more resolute I shall be in maintaining that a religious life out of which the political element is left is to that extent maimed and mutilated."

—REV. J. GUINNESS ROGERS.

AN admirable and successful non-denominational Christian work is that conducted by the London Bible and Domestic Female mission now in its thirty-fifth year of active work. It employs one hundred and thirty Bible women, eighty-two nurses and one hundred and sixty lady superintendents in London, besides forty-one Bible women abroad. A similar work is conducted in Montreal.

ONE of Lowell's (Massachusetts) unique institutions is a mission for tramps. An earnest Christian man visited these tramps in their lodging houses, afterwards hired a store in the heart of the city, trusting to outside financial help. This has never failed. Forty have often been given hot soup and a bed in this room, where, by earnest conversation, deserving cases are found out and many have been reclaimed and converted.

"I TELL you, gentlemen, that you, (the anti-Tammany citizens of New York) are a disorganized mob, an independent body of free lances and free thinkers. Tammany is an army, with a general at its head, with leaders in every ward and every man a soldier down to the lowest private who is getting his bread and butter out of it. And they are getting their bread and butter out of it, and they know they will continue to do so."—EX-MAYOR HEWITT.

Can Consumption be Cured?

This question is an interesting one to all—a vital one to many. We answer, "Yes." It is, however, true, that in a large majority of cases it is not cured. So great is this proportion that the statement that one can cure consumption meets everywhere with great incredulity. Drs. Starkey & Palen, the discoverers and sole dispensers of Compound Oxygen, stake their personal and professional reputation on the assertion that they have often cured consumption in their practice of twenty-three years. They court the fullest investigation of this declaration. They will prove it in the very words of many of the best and best known people in the country. They will, on request, mail a book which shows how and why Compound Oxygen cures this dread disease. If you have consumption; if you are threatened with consumption; or if your friend is so menaced, do not give up hope, but rather write us a plain statement of the case and have pointed out to you, without any expense, a well-traveled way of escape. Investigate and act at once. Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

AND WORLD'S WHITE RIBBON.

FOR GOD AND HOME AND EVERY LAND — WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOUNDED 1883

"THOU HAST GIVEN A BANNER TO THEM THAT FEAR THEE; THAT IT MAY BE DISPLAYED BECAUSE OF THE TRUTH."

Volume XIX. CHICAGO, March 23, 1893. Number 12

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's and Natioual W. C. T. U., sending the same through the authorized channels to the treasurer of her nation, asking her to send it to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Attempts at dynamite outrages have been made by anarchists at Rome.

The long overdue steamer Sarnia, of the Dominion line, arrived safely in its Halifax port, March 19.

The further consideration of the Irish Home Rule Bill has been deferred until the reopening of the British Parliament after Easter.

The Reichstag committee on the army bill, March 17, at Berlin, rejected the second reading of the bill and then adjourned till after Easter.

M. Jules Francois Camille Ferry, president of the French Senate, and a prominent journalist, lawyer and politician, died very suddenly in Paris, March 17.

The presidential campaign in Honduras is a clash of arms between the rival candidates, Policarpo Bonilla and General Vasquez, as reported by cable this week.

James H. Blount, for the last twenty years a member of Congress from Georgia, has been appointed chairman of the Hawaiian commission of inquiry by President Cleveland.

A primary and secret meeting of the saloon-keepers of Indiana and several adjoining states, looking toward a consolidation into a National league, was held in Indianapolis last week.

An amendment to the constitution of Minnesota, which will confer upon women over twenty-one years of age the right to vote for all municipal and county officers, was passed by the senate last week.

At a largely attended meeting of Chicago physicians, March 18, "Cholera, Its Prevention and Treatment," was thoroughly discussed, the consensus of opinion being that if care is exerted there need be no fear of an epidemic. A committee was appointed for carrying out the preventive measures suggested.

The legislative investigation of the coal combine in Minnesota, on March 17, gave to the public letters which conclusively prove that a great "trust" exists under the prime regulations that each wholesale dealer shall pay one thousand dollars, and each retail dealer one hundred dollars entrance fee to the general manager, and that the supply of coal is absolutely cut off from all persons who desire to sell it without authority from the "combine."

The famous Tremont Temple of Boston was destroyed by fire last Sunday. The loss is estimated at $300,000. White-ribboners have felt a special interest in this structure ever since it entertained our great convention in 1891. The Temple was erected in 1827 as a theater. In 1843 it came into possession of the Baptist society, who desired to provide a place for worship in the heart of Boston, on the free seat basis. It has been twice burned to the ground, in 1852 and 1879, the last structure having been erected in 1880.

WE are gratified to state that Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., has already received one hundred dollars towards sending a white ribbon missionary to Japan to finish Miss West's work. Is there not "more to follow" for this good cause? Send all contributions to Mrs. Williams, at 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Can.

WM. D. PRESTON, cashier of the Metropolitan National Bank, the Temple, Chicago, Ill., has been elected treasurer of the Temple fund by the board of Temple trustees, to succeed Miss Pugh, the former treasurer. Mr. Preston is the son of the gallant David Preston, who, in 1884, was the Prohibition candidate for governor of Michigan. There is no man in Chicago with a more enviable personal and business record than Mr. Preston bears with dignity and modesty. The friends of the Temple may rejoice to be served by him.

A NEW anti-license bill indorsed by Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore and others, is now before the Massachusetts legislature and provides for the appointment of a commission of three, the chairman of which shall be designated the state liquor manager. When a town votes to have liquor sold within its precincts, the commissioner is authorized to establish agencies not to exceed one to every thousand inhabitants; sales to confirmed inebriates are prohibited, only pure liquors are to be sold and no profit is to accrue to the state.

IN the English House of Lords ninety minutes were devoted to the temperance reform on the evening of March 2. The Direct Veto Bill was indorsed and a licensing system advocated for towns that did not adopt prohibition under the direct veto. The Swedish system seems to be the favorite method, and one of the bishops of the Church of England emphasized the value of the local option law that it is thought will be obtained before many months, for the reason that in the municipalities women have the ballot and can be counted on to help close the public houses, and yet some people say that the women's ballot is a "side issue"!

MISS ANNA GORDON reached Chicago last Tuesday, having landed in New York from England the Saturday previous. She has returned for a few weeks to superintend her plans for the children's fountain at the World's Fair. The central figure for this fountain is unique and beautiful, representing a little girl offering a cup of cold water to the thirsty multitude. This figure is now being wrought in bronze, and will be shipped to this country in time for the opening of the Fair. The fountain is paid for by pennies gathered up from temperance children all over the world, and any who would like to contribute will please send their money to Miss Anna Gordon, at Evanston, Ill.

MRS. ELIZABETH WHEELER ANDREW and Dr. Kate Bushnell gladdened the hearts of the leaders of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union headquarters, in London, by appearing among them on the 6th of March. Our white ribbon pioneers were evidently in excellent health and spirits, and made the impression of godly women who had been successful in the highest sense throughout their two years of honest, hard work in the name of God and Home and Every Land. They have visited Egypt and Palestine, and we hope to give the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL letters from their pointed pens that will reveal some of the vicissitudes through which they have passed.

WHEN the time comes for holding the annual state, district, county and local conventions, speakers will be wanted, and we hope our leaders will remember that the Woman's Lecture Bureau is one of the affiliated interests of the National W. C. T. U., and as such calls for the coöperation of all unions. The liberal patronage from all is necessary, that this part of the National work may not be an added expense. If liberally patronized, it can be a source of income, and such we earnestly hope to make it. The best speakers, elocutionists, evangelists, etc., are on the bureau. The patronage of all reform and literary associations is solicited, but it is the duty of the unions to help the bureau. For terms and dates, apply to Lucy E. Anthony, manager, Somerton, Philadelphia.

THE great Petition will be on exhibition until the World's Fair ends,—October 31—and we greatly hope that names will be added right on through the summer and autumn. Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Ravenna, O., sends out the blanks and instructions for signatures. Miss Alice Briggs, Evanston, Ill., receives them when filled.

MR. AND MRS. JOHN G. WOOLLEY sailed from England March 4, and arrived in New York the 14th. He has been six months in England, and the best accounts come to us concerning the meetings held by him in the leading cities of England and Wales. Much good has resulted to his Rest Island mission, near Minneapolis, Minn., which is the central thought of Mr. Woolley's life and work. It is safe to say that no man has ever visited England to speak for temperance who has made for himself a more solid reputation as a Christian and philanthropist, while, as a speaker, Mr. Woolley occupies first rank on both sides of the sea. A brilliant reception was given these friends in Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle, Brooklyn, last week.

THE most beneficent results of self-denial come, not from the money it puts into the treasury, but from the discipline involved to the individual, a discipline promotive of spiritual growth and power. It is not enough that we hand over our dollar (or whatever the amount may be) at the end of denial week. Unless the dollar is the symbol of sacrifice, unless it represents a surrender of some form of individual ease or pleasure for the good of others, self-denial week loses its significance; its chief object is not attained and the gift is in a great measure robbed of its value. Every W. C. T. U. woman, whether rich or poor, is asked to deny herself as far as her conscience will allow for the week beginning April 3, and during these seven days at least to say with David, "neither will I offer unto the Lord my God of that which doth cost me nothing." There is in the spiritual realm as in the physical a wonderful power in concentrated thought and action. And when, as during denial week, hundreds of thousands of hearts and minds are not only concentrated but consecrated in holy purpose, the result is the removal of mountains—herculean feats of faith vitalized by works.

THE press of Chicago is engaged in a united and most laudable effort to secure a non-partisan municipal government. Each paper published a blank, to be filled out by voters and sent to a certain post-office box, giving the sender's choice for mayor, also for ward alderman. As a result an independent ticket has been nominated, with Samuel W. Allerton at the head. He is a "municipal reform" man, and we believe worthy the franchise of good people. This action has been precipitated by the Democratic nomination of the notorious Carter Harrison. Any other year the respectable element would doubtless have borne this with the patience which characterizes our American people; but to have such a man the mayor of the city during the year of the Fair is more than decent citizens of Chicago can endure without protest. People without regard to party affiliations unite in the movement. The one object of all is to secure a competent, efficient city government, which shall properly maintain the dignity of our institutions before the critical eyes of our visitors next summer. There is a wisdom in the movement, which we hope will not be forgotten when the special circumstances which develop it at present are past. What reason can there be, aside from the benefits accruing to politicians of the baser sort, why a municipal government should be allied to any political party? To secure the safety and best interests of the citizens in all regards is supposed to be the object of a city government. This end can be reached only by having in office honest, capable, efficient men. Other things being equal, their political affiliations have no more to do with the qualifications of men for the position of alderman or mayor than for the position of a locomotive engineer or of a watch-maker.

TAKE HEART.

BY L. EUGENIE ELDRIDGE.

The breakers beat the strand,
  The storm king rides the sea,
The booming gun on land,
  Tells some ship's agony.
The foundered bark lies low,
  As billows lash and roll,
While thrill with wildest woe
  The sailor's nerve and soul.

But see! the life-boat speeds!
  It cuts the raging foam;
Now brave, heroic deeds,
  Restore the sailor home.
When ev'ry hope seemed lost,
  When life was slipping fast,
Thro' peril, thro' great cost,
  Came rescue at the last.

And thus, how oft in life,
  In hours of greatest need
Dark clouds, with sorrow rife,
  Roll back—from us recede.
Oh! list, all nature's call,
  Its silver tones ring clear:
"When deep shades darkest fall,
  Lo, day-break then is near."

Oh, fainting hearts, look up!
  Oh, sorrowing ones, be glad!
Howe'er the bitter cup
  May render grieved or sad,
Whoso doth watch and wait,
  His strength is as his day;
Behind the clouds of fate,
  Shines Heaven's enduring ray.

HIS DELEGATE.

BY "SELA."

(Concluded.)

"See here, Jessie, it won't do at all not to ask Morrison to your 'tea' or whatever you call it! It's two weeks now since Miss Carlyle has been with us and I've never even asked him to call. I'm sure he feels it, although he's too much of a gentleman to show any difference in his behavior toward me. I know you have a deep rooted prejudice against him and I hate to ask you, but Jessie, it's a matter of business, don't you see?"

The fair face of the young wife was clouded as she sighed—

"Oh, dear, dear Hal! I just can't ask that man to come into my house and sit at my table! Maybe—" brightening a little, "maybe he's forgotten she's here; and besides why should a man like him want to meet such a girl as Ruth! She doesn't dance, nor play cards, nor attend theatres; now you know he wouldn't care to know Ruth, Hal—" persuasively.

"Care!" Hal gave a low expressive whistle. "If you could just see him look at her."

A horrified look came over her face. "Harry Mathews, if that man has dared to even think of my Ruth!"

Mistress Hal was so very fierce that Hal laughed, perplexed though he was.

"Bless the child! See how her feathers are ruffled up! Don't you think your Ruth is able to take care of herself? and"—he looked slyly at her, "I guess you haven't painted Morrison in very glowing colors, have you, Jessie? He can't hurt her, little foolishness, and he can injure me."

"Not more than he already has," thought the worried little wife; but she did not say so and answered slowly, "Well, I suppose it must be—"

He interrupted her with a kiss. "Then you'll have the note ready for me at noon, little girl? All right. Good-by till then," and man-like he went whistling merrily down the street, delighted to have won his own way so easily, while his wife went about her work with a little pucker on her fair brow. She had been in a transport of joy upon recognizing in the sweet singer a beloved college chum, and had besieged her with so many entreaties, that nothing loth, Ruth Carlyle had sent home her faithful old companion, and had gone to spend a few weeks in the pretty new cottage with the friend.

And now, Mrs. Jessie felt that she must lay aside her selfishness and pay some heed to the unspoken reproaches of her friends; so she had planned a most delightful little dinner, with justifiable pride in her pretty home, her dainty service and her lovely friend, and—it was all spoiled! She did not want that man! He always made her ill at ease; she never could keep her temper before him! And Ruth—but of course she was too sensible a girl to—and yet, he was a man of whom many a woman might be proud. What a noticeable couple those two would make! Mrs. Jessie hastily thrust that idea away; she was ashamed that it had entered her head. Then her thoughts flew to Hal, her dear, tender, fun-loving Hal; since Ruth had come to them he had seemed more like the Hal of old; only once had she been pained by the flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes which told of an enemy not vanquished.

With Ruth to help her, she had brought out the big Bible, and had re-established the little family altar, so long neglected, and only yesterday her heart had bounded gratefully when Hal had broken their silent blessing with the little sentence which he had used in the first days of their married life, for Harry Mathews had been brought up in a Christian home, and bore the name of Christ: He had meant to follow in the footsteps of his good, old father, but the young couple had soon moved away from home influence, and the gay, easy-going lawyer began to find how attractive life could be, and then came the partnership with the worldly, godless Sidney Morrison.

She grew hot with indignation as she thought of the gracious, courtly man, who, in his superior strength, could put from his lips the cup from which he only sipped, and hold it out to her husband who would drain its dregs! And she must invite that man into her home, to sit at her table, to listen to his brilliant, mocking speeches! There seemed no other alternative, and with a deep sigh, she wrote the invitation, into which a stiffness would creep despite herself.

She was not prepared for Hal's announcement that night at the tea table: "Well, little woman, all that worry this morning was for naught; take that pucker out of your brow, Morrison's not coming to your dinner." He laughed at the sudden illumination of her face. "He told me to present his compliments and his excuses to you, that he was sensible of the honor, etc., but that he would rather decline."

"Thank goodness!" interrupted Mrs. Jessie; then a look into her husband's merry eyes aroused her suspicions. "What is it, Hal? You're keeping something back!"

"Then you shouldn't interrupt me, madam. He said, also, that if Mrs. Mathews would permit, he would prefer to drop in some evening and spend it quietly with us."

"Oh!" and Mrs. Jessie's face was a study. "I'd a thousand times rather have him"—a pair of soft hands closed her lips, and a merry voice exclaimed:

"You very impolite people, to begin your muffins without me! If I had known what havoc you two were making among them, I wouldn't have stopped so long in the hall, not even for those lovely flowers." She pinched Mrs. Jessie's cheek lovingly, and slipped into her place. "Why don't you bring them in here?"

Mrs. Jessie looked inquiringly at her husband, who rose hastily.

"Why, I declare, I forgot all about them! Morrison sent up a basketful—thought you might use them tomorrow, perhaps;" and the next minute he deposited on the table a large, quaintly-shaped basket, full of violets, purple and white.

Mrs. Jessie groaned inwardly when she saw Ruth's face of delight, and watched her as she bent over the flowers many times that evening. Some evil genius must have whispered to that man that violets were almost a passion with Ruth; that she loved every leaf and petal of them, and who knew—and Mrs. Jessie fervently hoped that "quiet evening" would never come. But it did. One stormy night there was a very pretty picture in the parlor of "Heartsease Cottage," as Ruth had christened it; the dainty, homelike room, the cheerful, crackling fire, which the cool evenings rendered needful, the charming, young matron, with her shining samovar at her side, breathing out its friendly steam; the happily-contented man of the house, the violet-eyed girl in her blue gown, listening to the distingué man, who leaned negligently against the mantel, while he related an amusing little incident of the day.

That was not the only evening that Morrison sat in the lovely room, listening to the voice so sweet to his ears; and sometimes Mrs. Jessie frowned, and sometimes she worried, but always was she charmed. As day after day passed, and Hal's step was firm and steady, his voice heard in their little morning service, she at last flung care to the winds, and yielded to the enchantment of the moment.

Ruth's outspoken, hearty opposition to wine, her witty, half-sarcastic contempt for a man who indulged, had inspired Hal with a like feeling, and meeting with no temptation from the source which had always proved fatal, he began to throw off the yoke that had burdened him so long, and went to his business with a keen zest he had not known for months. Of course it never entered into his masculine head that Ruth Carlyle had the remotest connection with this change in himself, but Mrs. Jessie knew it, and thanked God for sending her just at that time.

It was with a sad face and tearful eyes that she realized Ruth's last day with her. They spent the hours quietly together, and in the shadowy dusk came a strong man whose hands were laden with violets. After one look into his impressive face, Mrs. Jessie meekly yielded, and left the two together.

There was a stillness in the lovely room for a time, while the man's eyes lingered tenderly on the girl who held the sweet violets in her lap, and whose face was very grave. He looked down upon her from his favorite position by the mantel, and watched the firelight linger and dance about her, then said quietly:

"May I bring you some more violets next month, Miss Ruth?"

There was no sound save the tick-tick of the tiny clock. At last she raised her eyes, and he saw that they were troubled away down in their violet depths.

"No, Mr. Morrison, you may not."

"Never?" and who could resist the pleading voice?

She rose, and all the violets lay at her feet.

"I am sorry; I wish it had not happened. I should have gone away sooner."

"But why, Miss Ruth?" and he drew himself up with unconscious pride.

She turned to him, and her voice rang out clear: "You ask me why, Mr. Morrison? What have you done to win the love of a true woman? What use have you made of the great gifts God gave you? Are there burdens that you have helped to lift from weakened shoulders? Are there aching hearts that you have comforted? Can you tell me of words of yours that have lightened the darkness of some one's sorrow?" Then her voice grew strangely sad.

"Oh, how can you undo all the wrong you have done? Can you give back to that mother the boy whom you laughed away from his God, down into ruin, and who is now an outcast from society and home, while you go on alluring others as you did him? I knew you long before I saw your face, for that boy is my cousin, and in that sad household your name brings with it a shudder. Do you think that I do not know who cast the shadow over this dear little nest?"

He stood like a statue, while her fresh young face poured out its indignation, and over his face there spread a sadness unutterable.

"It's too late—too late—"

She caught the low words and the ice all melted out of her voice. "Oh, no! no! It's not too late! Not too late to seek the Love you have neglected or to redeem the life that on its soul-side has gone to waste. New opportunities will come in place of those you have cast aside; and the stain of sin can be lost and forgotten when you will place yourself under the powers of an endless life. Will you do it?"

She waited breathlessly and an unspoken prayer arose.

"I will!"

Ruth's eyes were filled with tears as she looked into a white, suffering face and saw the determination of a new resolve. She stooped, picked up the fallen violets, laid them in his hand, then left him alone.

A year later, as the brilliant lawyer sat looking over his mail piled on the office table, he came across a letter from which there floated out the odor of violets. He caught his breath quickly and his hand shook as he tore open the envelope. A bunch of fragrant purple dropped out and a little slip of paper on which was written, "Come." He pushed aside the other mail; he cared for naught else now, and joyously he repeated the simple word over and over.

How restful the quiet, broad streets, with their great trees lovingly intertwining their branches above his head. No wonder she was so good and pure, if this had been her dwelling place. He would almost hate to take her from this peaceful nook, out into the whir of his busy life.

The great house door stood hospitably open, for it was a mellow eve in October, and the asters nodded their friendly heads as he went up the old-fashioned walk. He wondered if she would come to meet him; he half wished she would come down that flower-bordered walk. He saw a woman's figure in the dusky hall, his heart beat faster, then a hand clasped his, a pitying voice said, "My poor, poor fellow!" and he looked into Mrs. Jessie's sorrowful face.

All the joy died out of his heart; he knew there was a great mistake, and he braced himself for the unknown blow.

"Didn't you get my letter?"

He shook his head and only looked wistfully and piteously at her, as a dumb creature mutely asks to be put out of its misery; and with tears rolling down her cheeks, she told him of the accident—an unmanageable horse, and they had thought Ruth's injuries slight, but yesterday—and here poor Mrs. Jessie's voice gave way.

"How long?" his pale lips formed.

"At most a day; and then he followed her to the bright, cheery room, where a tiny child sat playing with a kitten on the white rug, and a violet-eyed girl lay upon a low couch watching the door wistfully. Mrs. Jessie took up baby Ruth, and once again left the two alone. The tender eyes smiled up into his.

"Don't, Sidney, don't! It is best as it is, and I am very happy. And now let me say, I thought I despised you. I thought I would be unworthy my name did I care for you; but I learned better, and, Sidney, that knowledge has been both bitter and sweet. I could never have given my life into your keeping, and so God in His tender compassion has spared us all the long years of pain and sorrow, for I'm going where I can wait for you. I'm not afraid for you. I have heard how you hunted up that poor young fellow, and stood by him until he was redeemed from his bondage. I know how you have helped and encouraged Harry Mathews when he has been tempted, and I know, too, how you have been ridiculed and scoffed at in your new life, and through it all you have been steadfast and faithful. I know all this, and yet—Sidney, I must say it—Is it all the atonement you can make? Does He not ask more of you? You have a wonderful power of eloquence, persuasion, entreaty. Will you not give yourself in this cause which has so few powerful friends?" And she laid her little bow of white ribbon in his hand.

As the setting sun flooded the western room with glory unspeakable, and the gates of the Eternal City opened to let her in, he gave her his second promise, and "his delegate" was his forever.

THE STORY OF THE EAGLE'S NEST.

Miss Willard's Catskill Cottage.

BY MARY A. LATHBURY.

In September, 1891, Miss Willard, who had failed to find her summer rest or the month of quiet so much needed before the National Convention, closed a letter to me with a cry for rest, ending with: "I would rather be in Twilight Park just now than anywhere in this world." Mr. C. F. Wingate, of the Twilight Club, New York, and founder of Twilight Park, hearing this through a friend to whom I had repeated it, said: "She shall have a lot!" and the lot was given, and the fact announced at the Boston convention.

Some months later Miss Willard resolved to utilize this bit of real estate by putting upon it a cottage, that might be a real Rest Cottage. A little legacy from an uncle coming to her at this time made it possible. And so, as my summer home is at Twilight Park and as the building of the cottage could not be attended to by her in person, Miss Willard placed the matter in my hands. Plans were made, which were approved by Miss Willard and her friends and then given to the builder, and soon a modest little cottage began to rise on the spot chosen after much deliberation, as fittest for an "Eagle's Nest."

FRONT VIEW OF EAGLE'S NEST.

Twilight Park lies on the breast of High Peak, more than two thousand feet above the level of the sea, and just at the head of the wild and lovely Kaaterskill Clove (canyon) through which Rip Van Winkle climbed, the legend runs, to take his twenty years' nap, and down which the "little men" rolled their bowls on moonlit nights. Just here at the head of the clove Haines' Falls drops its beautiful double fall one hundred and sixty feet, and goes tumbling down in seven cascades through the four-mile length of the clove. Two other falls, the Kaaterskill and the Santa Cruz, send down their cataracts from the steeps on either side to join it, the former in full view across the clove the latter about three hundred feet from Miss Willard's cottage.

THE REAR OF EAGLE'S NEST.

The cottage is built upon a knoll rising from a wooded slope, a ledge of rocks forming a terrace in front of it. In the near foreground lie the green depths of the clove and beyond the mountains, receding to right and left, reveal the beautiful valley of the Hudson with the river and its plying steamers, while further the eye is carried far out into New England where the blue Berkshire Hills outline the horizon. No camera has ever caught half the breadth of this view, which, with its changing tints of green and gold and amethyst and faintest blue, seems rather to belong to the celestial country than to the world we live in. So "fitly set" is the "Eagle's Nest," with an ever widening vista through forest and mountains before it, that a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the region, who visited the spot, said at once: "This is the eye of the park."

OUTLOOK FROM EAGLE'S NEST.

The cottage itself is very simple. One large living room with staircase, ample fireplace and a deep bay window, framing the out-door picture I here try to describe, and a kitchen annex with a maid's room comprise the "down stairs," while two low chambers that a wide door may throw into one, are all that the place can boast above stairs. Mrs. Barnes, who has been most helpful in planning for the comfort of the future occupants of the cottage, agreed with us that there should be room enough for two—possibly for three—but no more, since it is to be a hermitage.

There are simple but artistic fittings of silver-birch within, and the veranda supports and rails are of the same. These, with the hemlock slabs that cover the lower half of the cottage without, encourage the illusion that it somehow belongs to, and has grown up with the forest that surrounds it.

An "outlook"—now in an unfinished state—has been added as an extension to the veranda at the front of the cottage, and became the final point of hundreds of pilgrimages last August and September. Beside the attraction of the name of the mistress of the Eagle's Nest, the outlook offered the one perfect point of view to lovers of the mountains.

Since Miss Willard is "not at home," I may speak freely to her large and loving family of a little plan which Mrs. Barnes and myself deemed a feasible and proper one, and has been partially carried out. As New York is Miss Willard's native state, it seemed meet and right that her friends in this state should have the privilege of adding to the cottage such articles of furniture or adornment as would make it habitable and homelike. We therefore issued an invitation to this effect through the Woman's Work for Temperance—the state organ—and the result has been a very generous response from some of her personal friends and also from a few unions. The money has been used in furnishing the chambers and in clearing the grounds, forty-eight dollars of the amount still remaining in hand. There is still very much to do before the house and grounds will be ready for occupancy, and as all has been undertaken without Miss Willard's knowledge or consent, we will take this opportunity while her back is turned to invite any individual or any union having a desire to do so to add to the list we append and enable us to complete the little Catskill cottage in the spring, so making it a comfort and delight, and above all, a place of rest. It is so situated as to be secluded without being isolated. It is in a quiet part of the park with the "Squirrel Inn" a few hundred feet away—a house kept by two cultured Quaker ladies who are staunch believers in all the W. C. T. U. stands for. The lots adjoining or near the Eagle's Nest have been purchased by women also, and the names of some of them are familiar to lovers of good literature.

It has been the privilege of the writer to hear some very touching tributes to the far-reaching influence of the W. C. T. U. and its leader from the workmen who have been employed on the cottage. The Catskill people are—as many people in mountain regions are not—generally intelligent, moral and many of them religious. While the cottage was building a liquor war was in progress in the nearest town, three miles away. "No license" had been carried by the townsmen, but the keepers of the great summer hotels and the saloons had found a flaw in the proceedings, and were fighting it in the courts. Our builders were of the "no license" party, and whenever a workman was called to court for a day or more, his wages were paid to him as if he had done full duty. We could hardly chide them for delays under the circumstances. "I didn't know that I was working for her," said one, and began doing lovingly what he had done faithfully. One man at work on the roads near by came to look at the cottage, and finding me there, asked me many questions, ending with: "Will you please give me her address?"

When Miss Willard comes to the Eagle's Nest no delegation shall meet her with a speech, no brass band shall escort her to her cottage, and no meeting or reception shall be arranged for her, for here she is to rest; but if a workman or a mountaineer should seek the Eagle's Nest and lean over the lower half of the low Dutch door to speak to "her," I am sure he would receive a hearty welcome.

REFORM FORCES: CAN THEY UNITE?

BY ELLEN LAWSON-DABBS, M. D.

For several weeks I have been reading with a great deal of interest THE UNION SIGNAL articles concerning a proposed union of reform forces. All, so far, have been from a Prohibition standpoint, and nearly all from a Northern or Eastern point of view. The compass has much to do with our views, while circumstances and associations mould our feelings and opinions.

Clara C. Hoffman argues from the standpoint of the liquor question being the question of the day, and all others mere side issues. Mary T. Lathrap looks upon the question as a moral issue, such as carried the Republican party through to success. Woolley, of Minnesota, seeks to elevate the Prohibition party by describing the high moral character of its platform, as compared with the one-idea Alliance or People's party platform. Evans, of National Reformers, congratulates himself on the steady growth of his party compared with the first effort of the People's party, characterized as spasmodic.

From a Southern point I see things somewhat differently, and from a People's party standpoint I beg to offer my theory of "How Can Reform Forces Unite?" I have as little love as any one for the liquor traffic, whether represented by free whisky, high license or other mode of "regulation." But I look upon the drink question as the effect and not the cause, as the symptom and not the disease. The Prohibitionists are right in assigning the question to a moral plane—but, as a moral question, it is situated differently than anti-slavery. That issue was viewed entirely from a Northern standpoint, and from the vantage ground of non-use—having no slaves to liberate—so Abolitionists in all parties could unite. But the liquor question recognizes no Mason and Dixon's line,—like death it is everywhere.

The central idea, the finance question of the People's party, which is an evolution of the education obtained in the halls and lodges of the Knights of Labor and Farmers' Alliance, has much to commend it. The Knight and the Alliance man, both believing and practicing temperance, work early and late; one sees his loved ones toiling in factories, while the other calls his little ones into the cornfields and cotton patches to aid in meeting the expenses of a bare living; both hear politicians crying "tariff and over-production," when, however low the tariff, their empty pockets contain no money to buy cheap sugar nor low-priced clothing, nor to put shoes on their barefooted children; nor can they be made to see how a man can produce so much that he has not a second shirt to his back. The People's party man, too, is right so far as he goes. Like the Prohibitionist, he too, has arguments to sustain him, and is a living example of the things he tells you of. But, like the Prohibitionist, his complaint is but another effect of a great underlying cause, another symptom of a national disease.

Being a physician, I hope I may be pardoned in making a professional analogy. In all diseases there are causes, classed as exciting and predisposing. A predisposition may be one of inheritance, as a weakened constitution or diathesis from a disease in ancestry. The drink problem, with its enormous drain upon the resources of this country, can only be compared to an ill-conditioned, mal-odored ulcer, sapping the very life blood of an already depleted body. No amount of placebos, salves, ointments, liniments, will suffice to heal it, nor will cutting or slashing do. The cause lies back, and is both inherited and acquired—inherited from a weak, helpless, manacled, disfranchised womanhood, and acquired from the poverty-stricken blood of the nation. The blood is the life of the individual. The Bible taught that many centuries ago, and scientists are just beginning to realize all its wisdom. The circulating medium (finance) is the life-blood of the nation; when it is weakened, vitiated, congested in unwonted places, as now, the nation suffers; wasting diseases, with unnatural appetites, are produced; healthful tastes are replaced by morbid desires. The poverty of the working masses prevents their buying in quantities healthful, strengthening foods; the weakness of ill-fed bodies, the craving of unappeased hunger in tissues, entices them to satisfaction by stimulants. "My people perish for lack of knowledge." True, and for lack of means to apply their knowledge. The national system is depleted, and its life-blood (finance) is congested in the coffers of the few, the national banks and corporate bodies, while the body politic is atrophying to decay.

The view of the People's party, that of themselves they can right these wrongs, I do not accept. A better distribution of wealth will be a priceless alleviation of the foul ulcer on the body politic, but it is not a cure. The people looking for causes of which their low wages are an effect, find the circulating medium restricted at the dictation of the money power, and wealth continually absorbed by private ownership of the highways of public traffic and transportation, as well as by the usury laws of banking and loan institutions, and believe they have solved the problem of growing poverty of the masses, and their brood of misery, vice and crime. And they are partly right, but do not go far enough to discover the cause.

I am willing to concede to Mrs. Clara Hoffman, from the W. C. T. U. point of view, that drink is the question of questions when the resulting miseries of the traffic are marshalled in sight. I am willing to admit with Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap that it is a great moral question and we should square to the plummet of our principles. I only contest with them the methods of attack and the batteries that must be trained against the common enemy. The same fiendish power is wielded alike in the two old parties to grind the faces of the poor and perpetuate the grasp of the whisky power upon this government. Being a W. C. T. U. woman I have pondered these things along their lines, but I belong also to the organizations, the Farmers' Alliance and Knights of Labor. I see the children toiling in the summer's sun and winter's winds, toiling that they may live, deprived of childhood's joys and denied advantages of education. When I read from my brother Knight's standpoint of the toiling millions in this land of liberty, shut up in shops and factories away from God's sunlight and free air, when I know that the hard, grasping power of the so-called Christians of wealth, and the grinding mills of monopoly are making prostitutes of our working girls, and criminals and tramps of our boys, then I know that the drink question is not all. The poverty of the masses and the drink question are but sequelæ of the financial legislation of this country; and back of both these lies the great moral wrong of this nation. Can figs grow from thistles?

From a motherhood of political slaves, can there be reared a nation of freemen? No law is better established in science than the law of inheritance. Scientists prate learnedly of the mother endowing her offspring with mental and moral capacities. Perverted inheritance can not evolve wise legislation. Commencing one hundred years ago to sow the seeds of a great moral wrong, the denying the mothers of this land political responsibility and freedom, the nation reaps the natural harvest of vice and crime.

Can the reform forces which ponder all these questions unite? I cannot see how they can keep apart. They do not run in parallel lines, but in convergent ones whose focus is just ahead, imaging a people with equal suffrage. Here they can all meet on high moral ground, without sacrifice of principles, and from hence march to the political millennium that is possible only when the mothers of this nation can voice their needs and judgment at the ballot box—and God speed the day of this union.

THE WORLD ABROAD, OR TEMPERANCE NOTES FROM FOREIGN LANDS.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD, M. D.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Bible of Nature," "International Health Studies," etc.

FREEZE-OUT LOGIC.

Pastor Joseph Hilgert, of Dorpat, Russia, has been exiled to the Ural, for having delivered a temperance lecture, and denounced the liquor traffic as a worse evil than the cholera. The liquor tax yields 40,000,000 rubles a year, but with all its resources the Russian government may have found it easier to banish the lecturer than to answer his arguments.

A FRANK BARBARIAN.

A Soudanese chieftain whom Prof. Hagenbeck (the German Barnum) had brought to Berlin, was introduced to some representative of the Ethnological society, who asked him how he had enjoyed his trip, and which of all the wonders of the German metropolis had impressed him the most. "What surprises me most," said the ingenious savage, "is, how you can move the enormous freight trains on your railway tracks, and how you can manage to swallow the horrible drinks sold in your restaurants."

THE SCHOOL OF EXPERIENCE.

Billy Bombastes, as the English residents of Berlin call the young Kaiser, repudiates the idea of needing the advice of a counsellor, but does not seem wholly inaccessible to the lessons of experience. The ridicule showered upon his champagne-orations has not altogether missed its purpose, and during the recent convention of the Brandenburg notables, the young autocrat kept as sober as a dervish, and surprised his audience by an extra conservative speech. His worship of medævial customs may prevent him from joining a temperance society, but he has evidently come to the conclusion that alcohol and politics must be kept apart.

ASSASSINATION DRUGS.

The word "assassin" is derived from the hashish drams, by which the Sheike-al-Jebel (a Syrian highland prince) is said to have stimulated the courage of his desperadoes; but a penchant for manslaughter is not the exclusive product of hemp-extract. Four-fifths of the homicides perpetrated in the slums of Naples can be traced to the influence of wine, and in Paris the word "absinthe-brawl" has become a synonym of a rowdy scuffle.

TEMPERANCE TESTS.

During a recent conflagration in the harbor of Baku, on the west shore of the Caspian, a number of Circassian laborers rushed to the landing and prevented an imminent explosion by rolling a lot of heavy naphtha barrels up the steep slope of the levee, with an ease and dispatch as if they were trundling toy hoops. In less than five minutes a dozen of the athletic natives had thus rolled a hundred barrels to a place of safety—a feat which a score of Russian longshoremen could hardly have achieved in less than an hour. While they were about it, the plucky highlanders (who never touch liquor in any form) also saved several bundles of hides, and incidentally refuted the assertion of an American drug doctor that "the children of moderate drinkers, as a class, are more vigorous than the children of total abstainers." The real secret of that wide-spread delusion can probably be found in the circumstance that a good many of our American teetotalers have been scared into reform by the progress of some disorder due to long-continued habits of intemperance.

THE NICOTINE NUISANCE.

The New Zealand colonists permit ladies to vote on their boards of education, and those votes probably can claim the chief credit for the sensible provision that in deciding upon the applications of rival candidates, preference, cœteris paribus, shall be given to abstainers from tobacco and strong drink. Our California temperance societies, too, are beginning to strengthen their platform by the addition of an anti-tobacco plank, while the other extreme is the nicotine mania of Southern Mexico, where teachers keep cigars and matches on an inside shelf of their desk, and school-girls, in their earliest teens, roll cigarettes in the intervals of their recitations.

ANTI-REFORM BIGOTS.

The cholera scare of southern Europe has revived the interest in sanitary reforms, but in Madrid a French lecturer, who had ventured to recommend moderation in the use of alcoholic beverages, was nevertheless interrupted with cat-calls and cries of "Que Quire? Sera agente de un Cafetero"—"What is he driving at, anyhow? He must be an agent of some coffee-house keeper," etc., insinuating that the temperance zeal of the eloquent foreigner was intended to boom a consignment of French coffee. One reason of the demonstrative discourtesy is probably the prohibitive tariff of the French government and its depressing influence upon the Spanish vineyard industries; but another explanation can be found in the circumstance that Spain expends 102,000,000 pesos a year for her army, and only 1,500,000 for educational purposes.

HISTORICAL EVIDENCE.

Professor Virchow, of Berlin, is too careful of his popularity to commit himself to any direct protest against the alcohol outrage, and in reply to a leading question returned the evasive answer that "during the Middle Ages abundant physical vigor went hand in hand with a love of drink (Trinklust) limited only by the resources of individual topers." The last-named limitation affected, however, at least nine-tenths of the mediæval beer-worshipers, who, in stress of circumstances, often restricted their revels to "ember-eves and holy ales"; and Dr. Egener, of Breslau, reminds the diplomatic professor that the history of the Middle Ages records several cases of rather emphatic protests against the habitual use of intoxicating drinks. King Wenceslaus, of Bohemia, was solemnly reprimanded by a delegation of his own subjects, and at last forced to resign, because he failed to keep his penchant for strong drink within the limits of common decency; and the Emperor Maximilian, the First, of Germany, once immortalized himself by the following remarkable explosion of candor, in the presence of his whole court: "Deus æterne! risi tu vigilares, quam male esset mundus, quem regimus nos, ego miser venator, et ebriosus ille et scelleratus, Julius!"—"If heaven did not guide the universe, what would become of a world, ruled by such wretches as I, a poor hunter, and that drunkard and criminal, Julius,"—alluding to his contemporary, Pope Julius II., whose dissolute habits scandalized the very troopers of his body-guard.

OBNOXIOUS ENTERPRISE.

A Christian native of Damascus is trying to get a license for the establishment of a brewery in Jerusalem, but Djessid Pasha, the governor of Syria, most honorably hesitates about granting the request,—"in deference," as he says, "to the scruples of the Jewish and Christian residents."

VIRTUE BY PROXY.

The return of Brazilian immigrants with ghastly tales of woe, has led to an investigation on the part of the Republican government, and the chief grievance of the malcontents now seems to have been the circumstance that the planters of the Province of Matto Grosso refused to entrust their contract-laborers with brandy. In several cases they offered to raise their wages beyond the terms of the original contract, on condition that the sum be deposited in a local bank, but the foreigners (Russians many of them) insisted on monthly payments or an equivalent in strong drink.

A BLIGHTED WORLD.

One of the strongest objections to the philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer is the famous summary of his "Parerga," where he plainly confesses his belief in the advantages of non-existence. "If an unprejudiced observer," he says, "could realize the aggregate of pain, wretchedness and disease which the sun surveys on its daily course, he would surely admit that it would be better if the rays of that sun had never evolved the phenomenon of life, but left our earth in the state of unorganic peace enjoyed by the surface of the moon." But is that terrible indictment not almost justified by the infinitude of misery due to the prevalence of the alcohol vice?

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A NIGHT IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is no light matter to gain admission to the "Ladies' Cage" in Parliament. Only a menagerie of sixty specimens can be accommodated at a time and "inflooence" must be large and of long standing to secure the precious pasteboard that admits. Our British white-ribbon leader is a friend of Miss Peel, daughter of the speaker of the House of Commons, and by this combination of good will was the complicated lock undone.

We found ourselves in a little, dark closet, where reading or writing was impossible, save to the front row. An iron grating, through the openings of which a man with a big fist would vainly strive to pass that member, was before us, and, as she was not present, one of us had Mrs. Gladstone's leather-covered chair. Just below, for the sisterhood has high privileges in Parliament, being so far up in the end of the gallery that only clear-voiced speakers can be heard, was the gallery for men, accommodating about one hundred and twenty. It was full to-night because the famous local option bill was to be introduced. Among others we descried "the good gray head" that all men (who care for temperance) know—that of J. Raper, and near by, James Whyte, of the Alliance, Henry J. Osborn, press manager of that society, beside them our own brother, John G. Woolley, and a host more.

On our left, in a front seat of the gallery, was Canon Farrar, chaplain of the House. Alert and smiling in his place, sat Sir Wilfrid Lawson, far and away the temperance chief of England. Beside him was Hon. W. S. Caine, M. P., another loyal standby of our cause, ready to champion it along with the great Sir Wilfrid.

Face to face, on long settees, were the leaders, Liberal and Conservative, the rank and file of their following; looking down upon the two great parties were the Irish contingent, seated at the end of the hall, opposite our cage and under the gallery of strangers.

The tall, carved chair of the speaker had its back to us, but from its depths proceeded the firm tones of the man whose mental equipoise is such that for seven years he has been speaker, repeatedly chosen by unanimous vote. "America might learn a lesson at this point," was our mental commentary. Three clerks (or "clarks," as it is incumbent to say here, for what reason, no one tells), with wigs of white horsehair and two tags of the same down their backs, besides long gowns of silk, keep the records and swear in the members. Nobody, in this house containing over six hundred members, has desk or chair, which seems a pity; all sit in long rows on benches covered with leather.

There are long stained-glass windows, but the soft light falls from the roof through mild reflectors. Here on the government bench sits Gladstone in the midst, tall, thin, intent, hand behind ear and pencil ready. We hear him speak five times, but all too briefly, in reply to questions from the opposition. "America would do well to subject the President's cabinet to a similar catechising," was our patriotic commentary.

At last Sir William Vernon Harcourt rises to introduce the Local Option Bill, for which Sir Wilfrid and his following have asked so long. Imagine Secretary Charles Foster, of Ohio, or his recent successor, Secretary Carlisle, of Kentucky, defending a temperance bill in Congress! We may as well admit that, as a nation, the English outrank us in political temperance, though far behind in total abstinence.

That was a good point when Sir William Vernon Harcourt said: "True, we cannot make men sober by act of Parliament, but we can put into their hands the means of making themselves sober." His speech is clear-cut, straightforward, without adornment, and frequently interrupted by opposing questions from the Conservatives and applause from the Liberals. Its delivery occupies about one hour.

A brewer follows in the usual jeremiad: "Vested interests have a right to claim protection; this bill is a menace to the trade"—and all the rest of it. Then a young man of twenty-six on the Conservative bench chimes with the brewer, and then Sir Wilfrid rises amid the cheers of the House. He is the most accomplished parliamentary speaker we have heard. He cares no more for the "opposition" than if they were so many grasshoppers, and yet he handles them as a mother might her teething child. When they break out with "No, no!" and "Oh, oh!" he repeats their words and tones, shows the absurdity of their objection with skill, deftness and good-natured humor, and leaves them silenced if not convinced.

The Conservative speakers had made the taunt that this was "a teetotal bill"; but Sir Wilfrid pointed out that among Her Majesty's ministers, who had drafted and brought forward the measure, there was not a single teetotaler. "I only wish there were," he added, and brought down the house. He did not, in all of its details, approve the bill, but should stand by it because it was such a long step in advance. The "gay wisdom" of the temperance Baronet was never more apparent than in this memorable speech. Mr. Caine followed in a similar line with sturdy, sensible words that struck home. Lesser lights now twinkled for a little, and about midnight the bill passed its first reading by the usual government majority.

During the session we scanned, between times, through our opera glasses, the famous figure of Henry Labouchere, Lord Randolph Churchill, John Morley and other leading lights. They look amazingly like other folks, except that "Labby" has tones and action of remarkable ease, grace and mastership. Mr. Chamberlain's sardonic features we could not descry, and Arthur Balfour was too ill to attend. In the gallery with us were the stately form of Lady Lawson, Lady Frederick Cavendish, a new figure on the temperance stage, Lady Elizabeth Biddulph, of the British Women's Temperance Association, and Lady Harcourt (daughter of our Motley, the historian, and wife of the Chancellor of the Exchequer). The charming Miss Peels were also present and invited us to tea in the Speaker's house, which is part of the great Parliament buildings.

Earlier in the night came our reception by Methodists of London in John Wesley's famous City Road Chapel. This was one of the very best among all the "good times" we ever enjoyed, and our friend, Rev. J. S. Cooke, a London pastor, agreed to write it up.

In closing, here is the gist of the bill: No compensation is proposed for those whose business is voted out. When one-tenth of the voters ask the privilege they shall have it, in every municipality, to vote Yes or No as to the continuance of public houses; if two-thirds do vote No, then in three years they shall be for three years closed, and only by a two-thirds vote can they be reopened.

Sunday closing is also by municipal local option, a majority only being requisite. But women vote on these issues, and "the trade" is already insisting through its journals that "only the male vote shall be taken!"

And yet—and yet—some good folk in America, and especially in England, say that woman's ballot is a "side issue." They will yet learn that it is the main line and leads to victory.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Your countryman, John G. Woolley, who has been in this country nearly four months, finds the claims upon him in America so imperative that he is soon returning to your shores, although he had many more inquiries for dates than could possibly have been filled, even had his stay been considerably prolonged. As it is, his early departure will preclude the holding of a number of missions both in England and in Ireland, for which, indeed, dates had tentatively been fixed. So completely has Mr. Woolley won the good will and even the affections of those with whom he has been in contact, all over the country, that should a return visit at a future time be found practicable, he is already assured of a warm welcome. The temperance cause in this country is the better for Mr. Woolley's stay, for no better missioner to the lethargic Christian conscience of these countries has yet been heard.

I did not myself come into personal contact with Mr.

But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord.—Jas. 1: 6, 7.

There seems to be a wonderful stimulation of interest in the Temple during the past few weeks. Money has been "active" and $100 pledges "lively," as the trade bulletins phrase it, and offers of real estate donations are "steady." It is true the Temple of late has had a good deal of "free advertising," and the "ends of the earth" are responding to the electric touch. The Temple makes its salaam to the thousands of gratuitous "documents" that have disinterestedly prodded the consciences of our good unions all over the land. There is a good deal of native nobility tucked away in human nature, which knows it is better to do better than to stop doing good—and that is safer security to "bank on" than the bank itself.

The following amounts on $100 pledges have been received: From the W. C. T. U. of Otterbein, Ind., $45; the Y's of Providence, R. I., $62, completing their pledge; W. C. T. U. of Humboldt Park, Ill., $7.11; Raymond, Mo., W. C. T. U., $14; Center Moreland, Pa., union, for Wyoming county pledge, $6.46; Belmont county, O., union, $13.12; Stockton, Mo., W. C. T. U., $33.75; Campville, N. Y., union, for Tioga county W. C. T. U., $10.25; $19.32 from Scotch Grove, Ia., W. C. T. U.; the W. C. T. U., of McKean county, Pa., $15, balance on its pledge; $100 from Pine Bush, N. Y.; $30 Rochester, Minn., W. C. T. U.; $5 from Johnson county, Mo., union; Garden City, Kan., $20; W. C. T. U. of Watertown, N. Y., $66.44; Delaware county, Pa., W. C. T. U., $24.78.

B. Franklin Leeds sends through his brother, Josiah W. Leeds, so well known to Prohibition as a loyal friend, $100 in memory of "our mother," Beulah Leeds, who entered the blessed life more than five years ago. Two hundred dollars come from Mrs. Elisha C. Wood and Mrs. Cynthia C. Wood, both of Upton, Mass. Three thousand such donors would make an era in woman's progress, even in these growing days.

Fairmont, W. Va., W. C. T. U., sends $8 toward its state tablet, and Grafton, W. Va., $5 for the same object. Mrs. Jennie P. Sisson, president of this state says: "When visiting the Temple on my return from Denver last fall I missed the name of West Virginia on the arch at the entrance of Willard Hall, and then and there determined that one of those four vacant blocks should have WEST VIRGINIA inscribed on it before June 1, 1893, our mite of help toward the magnificent structure which stands an honor to the woman whose brain originated it." Five dollars come from Mrs. M. A. Monroe, Chicago, for Miss Kellogg's tablet. The eleventh district, Iowa W. C. T. U. contributes $5 for tablet of Mrs. Shester, and $3 comes from Iowa for Mrs. Marion H. Dunham's tablet. Effie J. Pearson, Slippery Rock, Pa., sends $3.66 for the Frances J. Barnes tablet, and $1 comes from the Y's of Pomeroy, Wash., for the same purpose; Mrs. J. W. Prestwood, of Selma, Nova Scotia, sends fifty cents for the Willard memorial. Sharon, Pa., W. C. T. U. contributes $1 each to memorials for "St. Courageous" and Julia Ames, and $1 for Mother Stewart's tablet.

Mrs. J. A. Clifford, president of the seventh district Minnesota W. C. T. U., writes as follows: "Enclosed please find $20 to be credited to the seventh district of Minnesota, and to the individuals and organizations here itemized: Mrs. E. S. Wright, Red Wing, $3; L. T. L., Red Wing, $3.50; Frances Willard Y, Northfield, $3.50; Clifford Y, Warsaw, $5; Mrs. J. A. Clifford, Northfield, $5. Contributions are restricted to the seventh district, which makes this first payment on a $100 pledge for a tablet in memory of little Tommie Carse, son of Matilda B. Carse, who was killed in Chicago by a loaded beer wagon. The money for this purpose will be chiefly raised by the children and young girls of this district. Some time ago I wrote asking Mrs. Carse's permission to do this. She very touchingly consented, but said she could not help me through her column; 'her lips were sealed, the sacredness of silence seemed impossible to break.' So I send it in her absence, not knowing how you will manage, but it ought to be credited to this object, for it is most fitting that the dear child should be commemorated in the Temple—the life-work of the mother, consecrated to this cause through the little spirit, so soon released, yet which did not fail of his life-work. 'A little child shall lead them.'"

All checks, post-office orders, etc., should be made in the name of Wm. D. Preston, Metropolitan National Bank, The Temple, Chicago, Ill. Mr. Preston is the newly-elected treasurer of the Board of Temple Trustees. All letters containing funds should be sent to Miss Sara G. Johnson, financial secretary of the Board of Temple Trustees, The Temple, Chicago, Ill., who will deposit the money with the treasurer.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite-box ($3.65) before next May will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Wm. D. Preston. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse. So many requests have come asking for an extension of time on the mite-boxes, that Mrs. Carse has granted another month for those trying to fill one.

LOST AND FOUND.

BY JULIA MILLS DUNN.

Old Toinette sat knitting in the sunshine. Around her neck a string of amber beads glistened, the yellow skin against which they lay almost as yellow as they. Her eyes were duplicates of the beads, except as to color; they were round, glittering, but of a jet black. As her shriveled hands plied the needles ceaselessly, swiftly, Toinette grumbled to herself; clearly, the old woman was not in an amiable humor.

"'Noder drinkin' bout an' 'noder quirl—an' quirls fotch duels. Good fer ol' mistis to be out'n de way o' sech—but laws! Miss Marguerite jes' de same, full o' fire an' sperrits, an' boun' to die broken-hearted jes' as ol' mistis did, all count o' ol' marse's wicked ways."

"Toinette!" called a clear young voice from the farther end of the dilapidated old garden, "see what I've found, a bed of Jacqueminot roses half-overgrown with briars—just look!"

Marguerite de Lacey held them up above her head, the great, heavy blossoms that held the warmth and passion of a whole summer in their crimson hearts, making her way as best she could through the tangle of box, briar and weeds that obstructed what had once been a paved walk, toward the back porch where the old servant sat knitting.

She tossed a rose into the old woman's lap. "There, Toinette, I have given you the largest and finest one; see if you can drop that most disagreeable frown, and succeed in looking amiable."

Toinette clasped her hands dramatically. She had the French fondness for sensations, and would have considered it flying in the face of Providence not to utilize the present opportunity. She was really a creole, of mixed African and French blood, but race heredity is strong, and though her negro speech and manner seemed to dominate the weaker strain of blood, she was, at times, purely French in her tendencies.

"Laws! Miss Marguerite, don' see how ye kin be singin' 'mong de roses an' a duel gwine on dis minnit fer all ye knows. Ol' marse, he done tek too much wine las' night at de gen'lemun's dinner party, an' Marse Howard—well, he am a little sperrited, dat am a fac'. An' when the quirl began, so Jeff, he says—"

"Toinette! what do you mean? Tell me this instant, have my father and Howard quarreled?"

She dropped the roses at her feet unheeded, and stared at Toinette with pale face and wild, dilated eyes. Well she knew the high temper and unyielding disposition of her lover, the greatest faults of his noble and honorable nature. Well she knew, also, the vindictive spirit of her father, intensified by years of indulgence in wine drinking, a habit that had well-nigh destroyed his once fine intellect and generous, free nature, and left him only a wreck of his former self, obliterating his best qualities and strengthening the bad.

"All comes o' dat wine-swillin,' Miss Marguerite. I done tol' ol' marse dat more'n once, but laws! ye might as well talk to dat rose in yer hair. Jeff, he says Marse Howard didn't say nuffin 'tall till de longes' time, an' ol' marse aiggen him on, till at las' his temper clean gin out' an' he jes' clinch his hand, and turnin' to ol' marse, he says, 'when you beg me to come to dis house an' offer a public apology, I will come, not before.' An' wid dat he bowed to de gen'lmuns an' walked out, thout'n a word."

Marguerite stood speechless. All the glory of the day suddenly faded from sight, sunshine and bird songs were unheeded, the roses mocked her with their beauty, a feeling of chill despair gathered round her heart. She could not openly take sides with her father—pride forbade that—she could not seek Howard and apologize for her father's behavior, his unpardonable rudeness to one of his guests; there was but one way for a woman, a way decreed by custom and propriety—to wait.

But she, too, possessed tenacity of will—it was a de Lacey trait—and she waited in silence. From that day a change was apparent at the de Lacey Place. The young mistress of the house withdrew from all society, she saw no one, so took no active part in what transpired around her. To her father she was respectful, and thoughtful of his comfort as of old; she had once been devoted to his entertainment, but though she was not less kind and thoughtful than before, she would sit listless and abstracted in his presence for hours, scarcely seeming to notice him except when he addressed to her some question.

Mr. de Lacey was puzzled. He actually began in a vague sort of way to see something amiss with Marguerite, and in his dull and stupid brain, half paralyzed with alcoholic poison, there grew a steadily increasing conviction that Marguerite, the object that he loved best in all the world, except his wine, was fading away before his very eyes.

At last, one day a letter came to Marguerite from Howard, its soiled and dilapidated condition testifying to the roundabout journey it had made to reach her—for the enemy's troops guarded the mail routes, and permitted no suspected matter to pass its lines—telling her that he could endure the absence and suspense no longer, that he had written repeatedly and heard nothing, and if this was not answered within a week, he should take it for granted that he had offended her beyond forgiveness, and should immediately enlist in the army.

"I ran away to avoid fighting with your father, who seemed determined to leave me no way to preserve my self-respect. But I will show your father's guests that I am no coward for all that." The letter closed with a strong appeal for her to write, if only a line, to say that he was forgiven for his sudden departure. She glanced at the date of the letter. It had been written three months before.

And now a strange circumstance occurred. Her father, who had seen the wife of his youth die of grief and mortification from his drunkenness, who had turned away indifferently from the pleadings of his old friends who urged reform, who had seen, without one pang, his fine ancestral estates go to ruin under his mismanagement, conceived suddenly, a hatred for the thing that had cost him so much in self-respect, that had been, in short, his ruin, and little by little began to repair, as far as possible, the wreck of mind, body and estate.

Finally, when months had passed and no further word had been heard from Howard, he announced to Marguerite one morning at breakfast that he was going in search of him, and that very night; spite of her entreaties that he would avoid anything so dangerous as an attempt to pass the enemy's lines, he set out on his mission.

It was sunset on Pea Ridge, the second day. Right in the teeth of fierce Van Dorn, Carr, the lion-hearted, had fought all day. Lion in blue and lion in gray, they had fiercely contested for the rise of ground where the Confederate flag had floated over Price's headquarters. All day the tide of victory had ebbed and flowed through the smoke of battle that swept around the rival colors, now with the flag of blue, with its single star, now with the red, white and blue.

In a distant part of the battle-field, where sharpshooters and skirmishes had kept up a desultory fire all day, a man went eagerly through the fast-gathering shadows, looking over the groups of wounded and slain for the face of one who had been reported "missing." He was accompanied by two aids and a surgeon, and over the slopes of the hill side, through the sheltering bushes, he kept on and on, long after there seemed no possibility of success. But at last, just as the lingering rays were fading from the tall tree tops, he found him, Captain Preston, wounded, and left for dead by his comrades.

There was a long and slow convalescence for Howard, and as soon as he was strong enough he was removed to de Lacey Place, faithfully watched over by his remorseful friend, and later there was a wedding, at which Toinette amused them all by her extravagant demonstrations of delight.

"Ol' marse done foun' Miss Marguerite's sweeth'at, sure 'nough," she said, wagging her turbaned head sagaciously, "an' more'n dat, he done foun' de Miss Marguerite ob de ol' days, an hisself, too, when he gin up dat wine he bin use to, an' what dese French folk tink der's no ha'm in."

And a glance and smile from Marguerite to her husband confirmed the statement.

STENOGRAPHY AS A CALLING FOR WOMEN.

BY EMMA JACOBSON.

By statistics recently compiled, for the purpose of showing at the World's Columbian Exposition what women are accomplishing in different lines of work, the astounding fact has been revealed that over sixty million dollars have been earned during the last year by stenographers of the United States. The magnitude of this sum in itself shows how large a field of usefulness, activity and self-helpfulness has been opened up to women through stenography, which, up to fifteen or twenty years ago, was a comparatively unknown art.

Women are eminently fitted for successful stenographic work on account of their natural quickness of thought, accuracy, neatness and patience in details, all of which qualities a good stenographer must possess. Aside from these qualifications, however, a good education is absolutely indispensable—a fact which is overlooked by a great many young women who attempt to become stenographers without possessing a proper knowledge of orthography, etymology or syntax.

The injurious influence of these incompetent girls, whose only recommendation to a position is the low price for which they offer to work, is very great, and has a tendency to lower the salaries of stenographers in general, thus preventing those of better education from being paid what their qualifications should entitle them to. Beyond a certain limit, however, such competion is not felt, for in offices where the highest intelligence and greatest speed is demanded, the salary paid a stenographer does not make so much figure as her ability to meet the demands made upon her powers, and the applications of those who do not come up to the standard are not considered.

After having attained the highest possibilities which lie within the reach of an office amanuensis, there is still a field into which the aspiring young woman may enter—that of verbatim shorthand reporting. To achieve success in this line requires great courage, ability and endurance, but opportunities are afforded in it for as interesting, as useful and as remunerative a career as in almost any other profession. Only through patient study and practice can a young woman reach the high standard of excellence which is required of those who wish to do verbatim reporting, and many are the weary hours she must spend with a reader, dashing off pot-hooks, sky-rockets and chain-lightning streaks (as they appear to the uninitiated) before she can attain such speed as will enable her, "with flying fingers, to chain the winged thought."

The proficient verbatim reporter must be as well equipped mentally, and have as broad a foundation of general knowledge and culture, as is required in any of the other spheres of activity into which women are now so largely entering. In pursuing this career, a woman will find that almost every form of knowledge she has ever acquired can be turned into account, and many are the subjects with which she will have to familiarize herself in order to deal intelligently with matters which will come before her. She may be called upon, for instance, to report the proceedings of a convention of nurserymen, and it is a wise woman who, before entering upon such a task, initiates herself into the mysteries of top-grafting and root-grafting, heeling and puddling, or she will find herself, when she comes to transcribe her notes, lost in a magic maze of hieroglyphics to which she has lost the key. So in reporting a pharmacetical convention, a familiarity with the names, if not with the properties, of the different drugs, is essential, and the same may be said of any other branch. Each new term and new word must be carefully looked up in dictionary or encyclopedia and its proper application learned; for unless she has an intelligent understanding of what the speaker was talking about, the little crooks and circles, though ever so well made, may lead her to put the veriest nonsense into his mouth, and disastrous results may follow.

To the contemplative mind there are afforded many opportunities for observation, reflection, and a close study of different phases of human life and human nature. The infinite variety of work in which a shorthand reporter's services are required, bring her into contact with "all sorts and conditions of men," from the most dignified and fastidious president of a large corporation to the foulest criminal in the justice court. The contrasts afforded by a single day's work are often very great. The forenoon may be occupied in recording the details of a family quarrel in the court-room, the afternoon in reporting a religious meeting. Lectures by Moody and Ingersoll may be taken by her within the same twenty-four hours—litigation and prayer, theosophy and stock-breeding, funeral sermons and banquet speeches frequently come in close succession and are impartially recorded, one after another, by the same tireless pencil.

The stenographer's art enables her to penetrate into the very heart of things; to be familiar, from their very inception, with the great ideas which have resulted in the foremost movements of our times, and to come into close contact and mental touch with the leading men and women of the day. Her work is not mechanical, as many seem to think, but the true stenographer, with receptive mind and every faculty alert, enters fully and unreservedly into the thought and feeling of all great utterances which her pencil records.

THE SPIDER WEB.

Whenever I see
On bush or tree
A great big spider web,
I say with a shout:
"Little fly, look out!
That web seems pretty and white,
But a spider hides there, and he's ready to bite."

So if any one here
Drinks cider or beer,
I say to him now,
With my very best bow,
"Have a care of that lager or cider,
For there hides a wicked old spider.
And it fills him with joy
To catch man or boy
And weave all about him with terrible might
The meshes of habit—the rum appetite."

A KNOT OF WHITE RIBBON.

BY ANNIE TAYLOR.

Her name was Agnes, a little ewe lamb whom the Good Shepherd numbered with His flock and carried in His arms over the many rough places in her pathway.

Over her home a shadow had fallen, and you could see it in the barn door hanging on one hinge, the cows breaking hungrily through the tumble-down garden fence, and the overripe wheat dropping its kernels on the ground, while the farmer waited at the corner tavern to curse his "luck." He had reason to repent now, for winter was upon them, cold as the "oldest inhabitant" remembered, and his household "began to be in want."

"I just hate to do it, Hannah," he said to his wife, "but we'll just have to raise some money on the place to get us through. A man don't have such luck twice running, and next harvest'll see us clear again."

"See us without a roof for our heads, more like," said Hannah bitterly. "Look here, Tom Holden, just stop that talk of yours about luck, it's drink, and you know it, the great big fool that you are, signing pledges that you're not man enough to keep. I tell you I'm sick of it; slave, slave, from morning to night. Here! Agnes, get out of this; I can't have young un's forever under my feet."

Poor Agnes, who did want to help, went out quietly to where her father was putting the horse to the shabby little cutter with an unpleasant look in his eyes. His face cleared as he saw his little daughter.

"Want a ride, Agnes?" said he. "Jump in then. I guess your mother don't care." And Agnes was carefully wrapped in the worn old buffalo robes, and off they went.

"What idea of yours does this stand for?" said Mr. Holden as he noticed a bit of yellow-white ribbon pinned to his daughter's cloak.

Agnes flushed. "It isn't my idea, papa," she said, "and I don't know hardly anything about it. It's just some people, some ladies, and they have a Temple somewhere, and white ribbons," she went on confusedly. "They mean to put away drink all over the world; God told them to."

Her father slowly disentangled the lines from the horse's tail, a miserable feeling coming over him as he saw Agnes' pale cheeks and threadbare clothing, and thought of the boys kept away from school for want of books, and Marion away at her grandma's. "At least she will have enough to eat there," Hannah had said, when he missed his merry daughter and would fain have had her home again. And, as he had often done before, he vowed in his heart to give up the curse that was sucking his life away. Then talked to Agnes till her laugh chimed in with the sleigh-bells.

"The very man I was after," exclaimed Mr. Holden, as they saw Ben Grice's mare waiting outside the tavern, "I won't be a minute, little girl," and confident in the strength of his resolution he sprang out and entered the door.

"Not a minute"—an hour had passed, and Agnes looked wistfully down the long stretch of bush road which lay between her and home. The short winter's day was almost over, and the snow-draped trees looked ghostly in the twilight. She was cold, so cold, yet it was sorrow more than pain that brought the tears to her eyes, freezing there on the long lashes. "Oh, papa, papa." He came at last, staggering out of the door, to be helped into the cutter by the others.

"Just look at the child," said the tavern-keeper's wife. "Bring her in, Jim, she can stay here over night, looks about frozen already, and Holden isn't fit to take care of himself, let alone anybody else." But Holden with tipsy obstinacy would not hear of it, and Agnes, forgetting everything in her dread of a quarrel, hastened their departure.

The old horse plodded steadily through the snow while his driver lay across the seat in a drunken stupor. "Papa, papa," cried Agnes trying with feeble hands to rouse him. "Papa, wake up, you'll die, you'll die. Oh, what shall I do? Lord Jesus, dear Lord Jesus, 'no drunkard can inherit the kingdom of heaven,' you must not let him die, please, please don't."

All the wraps they had she put round him, even unwinding the long muffler from her own head that he might not die. Then all sense of pain and anxiety leaving her, she laid head her on her father's breast in sleepy content. How far away the sleigh-bells sounded! Agnes had a vague idea that she had gone to bed without saying her prayers, and tried to rouse herself.

"Our Father," she prayed sleepily, "bless papa, make him good and strong, and mamma, make things so they don't get in her way so much, and Rufus, an' Marion an' Tommy, an' everybody, an' the white-ribbon Temple people, for the Lord Christ's dear sake, amen."

A wonderful white light shone about her, and Agnes looking up saw that she was in the temple of her dreams. Trees, taller than she had ever seen before, stood, their snow-wreathed trunks forming the pillars of a vast cruciform enclosure. Above, arch beyond arch, glittering as if covered with fairy diamonds, were the great branches, through the delicate openwork of whose twigs one could see the sky, blue and starlit. Between the pillars, from roof to floor, were screens of frost work, intricate and beautiful as that which the winter elves trace on our windows. And in the heart of this white glory sat Agnes clinging to her father, who lay there, a blot on the scene. Agnes looked at him, then with loving foolishness took her scrap of white ribbon and strove to fasten it on him, wondering why her hands felt so stiff and strange, for she was warm now and very happy.

Above the great altar, from which shone the white light that filled the building, was an arched window, edged with icicles, and looking through it, Agnes saw a red glare in the darkness. "A fire," she said to herself, wonderingly, and as she looked it leapt into view, a great ocean of fire, whose flames seemed to reach the very heavens. On it came, sweeping over the darkness of the forest, crouching in terror before it, hurling itself against the white temple, whirling round it a cyclone of flame. But not a frost flower faded before it. Against the frail walls it spent its strength in vain, the white light not even stained with its red glow.

Great multitudes of people now moved silently through the white aisles of the temple, safe in the vortex of that fire maelstrom. Agnes looked up through the roof and the tunnel of flame which seemed to touch the sky, and saw, from among the stars, white ones falling slowly, "like feathers do," she thought, through the circle of the fire down to the temple. Then she saw white shining robes and snowy wings, and knew they were God's angels, come to keep the temple white, and she clung to her father.

"Agnes," said a low voice, and looking up, she saw a white one standing beside her. By the hair that fell veil-like to her feet, by the palm she carried and the lamb by her side, Agnes knew her as her namesake saint, Agnes, the white lily, whom Christ plucked for Himself from the black marsh of the Tiber centuries ago. "Agnes," said the saint again, "come, the Master calls for thee."

"Please, St. Agnes," said the child, "may I come back again to papa? He has nobody to take care of him to-night but me."

"Thou canst not return again to him," said St. Agnes, "but he shall come to thee. Fear not, lamb of the Good Shepherd's leading, the knot of white ribbon thou hast tied to-night shall bind him forever to heaven and thee."

Joyfully Agnes arose, leaving. The sweet saint stood looking at the sleeping man, and her grave Italian eyes grew soft and wet with pity as she thought of his waking. Then, clasping Agnes' hand in hers, she passed away with her to serve the Christ for aye in His heaven.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—It is now more than a year since our Cozy Corner was started and during all these months I have been cheered and delighted by the budgets of letters from nieces and nephews everywhere. Only a small part have been published, however, because our space is limited, and should these letters be numbered they would reach way up in the thousands. I know what a pleasure it would be to each one of you to help our Cozy Corner and to see your letters there. Now I am going to tell you just how you can enjoy this. By writing to the Cozy Corner a short letter about something you have learned concerning temperance, or about some interesting thing that has happened at school, home or play which you think the other boys and girls would like to hear. Then, too, if you write that you want to join the Cozy Corner, that you enjoy the children's page or that you are a temperance boy or girl or member of the L. T. L., your name will be enrolled in the Cozy Corner circle as below (which consists of those who have written such letters during the past week) and you will be given the countersign which is ——? Can you guess? Yours to extend our temperance ring,

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

I am not an L. T. L. boy, but would like to be. I am a Prohibitionist and would try and squeeze into the Cozy Corner, but must not take up much room. I promised never to play cards, use tobacco or drink. Yesterday at Sunday-school the superintendent asked if the men building the temple were happy. The school said "No." She then asked why, and one little boy said, promptly, "'Cause they was workin'." LEE SMITH.

Aurora, Ill.

I expect a hearty laugh followed that little fellow's answer. I hope he will find when he grows up that nothing will give so much genuine happiness as "workin'."

I am a little girl ten years old. Mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and I like to read Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner. I will send ten cents to Miss Gordon for the Willard fountain. I earned this dime by going without butter for three days. EMMA FISHER.

This good letter tells one way in which our Cozy Cornerers can deny themselves during Self-denial Week, April 3–10. I hope we will hear from others.

MODERN WOMEN AND THE WOMEN OF THE BIBLE.

The habit of inquiring, "What is the cause that the former days were better than these?" is so strongly rooted in the human breast that there seems little room to hope that the time will ever come when the grumblers will all be dead and no one left to bewail "the good old times."

As long ago as the time of Solomon we were assured in Holy Writ that the inquiry was foolish and profitless and still the ancient conundrum lives on. It is precisely similar to another over which men worried their brains, "Why does a live fish weigh more than a dead one?" The answer is simple—"It doesn't." So in regard to the stale query, "Why were the former days better than these?" the reply is merely, "They were not." As Whittier says, with all the failings of our present times, "the best is what we have to-day."

A very little investigation shows that our own age, with all its evils, is yet incomparably superior to anything we have any record of in the past since Adam and Eve left the garden of Eden. Yet, in some form or other, the old question pops up as complacently as if it had not been laid again and again. The most common form which the specter assumes to-day is in connection with the woman question.

There is a certain class of people who think that in a civilization utterly different from anything in the past, woman should remain precisely the same and hold exactly the same position that she did three thousand years ago. Government changes through various stages from the crude, simple form of absolute despotism to the complex machinery of a constitutional, parliamentary free government, and everything beneath the sun—but woman—must perforce adapt itself to these changed conditions. One social revolution follows on the heels of another; in a universe of change she alone of all earthly things must remain the same.

When the expanding life power which thus shows itself all through society bursts also the bounds of her environment and woman seeks to adjust herself to the new conditions, from the class of persons named arises a wail of despair. The good old days of Mary and even of Sarah and Rebecca are cited, and the women of the nineteenth century are solemnly assured that these models of feminine character would never have behaved as the women of this day and generation are behaving.

Alas, poor fossils! Unfortunately these lovers of the antique cannot be transported to the days of Rebecca and Rachel, and should these women be transplanted to the nineteenth century, they would very quickly become nineteenth century women, just as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, if introduced into modern society, must become nineteenth century men or be as inefficient and useless as the mummies of the Pharaohs.

Our attention has recently been called to one of these driveling platitudes upon the comparative merits of the women of the Old Testament and those of the present, in which Rebecca is chosen as the paragon. The writer asks "why this family should be cited at every marriage service, 'that as Isaac and Rebecca lived faithfully together,' in preference to all others?" and answers his own question by saying that it was because Rebecca displayed "the highest virtue entering into the female character, viz., modesty."

If there is any class of Bible readers in the world who make their theory and then read it into the Bible, it is that class of people who believe in the subordination of woman. On what authority can any man say that "modesty is the highest virtue of the female character?" The Bible nowhere, from Genesis to Revelation, hints at sex in character. When Mary forsook her household cares to sit at the Master's feet He gave her not the rebuke which the present opposers of women would surely administer, but said to the careful Martha, "Mary hath chosen the better part." His life was lived as a model for all the race, and not once did He hint that women were to single out one class of virtues and men another. Paul said to all alike, "Now abideth faith, hope, love; but the greatest of these is love."

We had always inferred that the reason for selecting Isaac and Rebecca as models for Christian homes rather than any other couple was due to Isaac's character more than to Rebecca's, as he is almost the only one of the Old Testament worthies who did not have more than one wife.

The writer in question further assures us that "it is absolutely certain that had Rebecca lived to-day she would not belong to that class of women who knock at the door of politics, medicine, the lecture platform, etc." We do not propose to dispute this statement as we do not feel prepared to say positively what Rebecca would or would not do under present conditions, but of this we are certain, that far better women than Rebecca, equally modest, and her superiors from every other point of view, already occupy high positions in these and various other callings.

We are further informed that Rebecca "knew just what to do and when to do it." We frankly admit that she was eminently successful in outwitting and deceiving her husband, but, in our judgment, her character would have been far more dignified and noble had she held the position of equality in the family for which the much-berated modern woman contends, and, instead of resorting to contemptible artifice and deceit to reach a good end, she had accomplished her purpose by fair and open means.

To the change in feminine character since the days of Rebecca is charged all the unhappiness of modern family life. In this as in everything else, "Blessings brighten as they take their flight." The evils of the present are very close to us and we are painfully conscious of them, but "the twilight of fable" throws an entrancing but deceptive mist over the past.

It is very easy to say pretty things about "the old-fashioned, peaceful and happy family life." But close scrutiny robs it of its charms. While there were exceptions, a great deal of the "peacefulness" of the "old-fashioned family life" was the peacefulness of absolute despotism. The family life of India may be "peaceful" but it is so at the cost of the enslavement of woman and the utter degradation of both sexes. We venture the assertion that if the most ardent believer in the subjection of woman could be transported to the "peaceful family life" of even a hundred years ago, he would return with a thankful heart to modern family life with all of its ills.

But there are real and grave evils in our present conditions. We blush to see girls crowding eagerly to the matrimonial altar and "engaging mothers exhibiting their daughters' charms at summer resorts," though we wonder somewhat at the denunciation of this latter custom from one who can speak approvingly of the custom in heathen countries of the parents making engagements for their children. Surely this is "parental guidance." We view with mingled sorrow and anger the spectacle of pure-minded, noble girls knowingly sacrificed to rakes and libertines. But this state of things is chargeable to those who sigh for the "good old days" and bind upon us customs adapted only to those "good old days" and utterly out of harmony with the present conditions.

The difficulty with the present is that we are in a transition period. New customs have unsettled, but have not completely replaced, the old. It is the inevitable struggle of progress which always brings a "sword." We shall remedy these ills, not by attempting the impossible and undesirable feat of going back to any "old times," but by marching straight forward. We do not want to introduce any more old customs. The trouble is we have too many already. What we want to do is to get rid of those which are in hopeless conflict with the genius of modern civilization. Not woman's reënslavement, but her complete independence, will solve the problem.

The idea that woman's only sphere is at home casts such disrepute upon unmarried women that it has made woman's life, from the cradle to the grave, a mad race for the matrimonial altar. This is why mothers offer their daughters to any bidder and women sacrifice themselves to men utterly unworthy of them. When marriage becomes no more of a necessity to woman than to man, all this will cease, nor will the home suffer in consequence. On the contrary, marriage will become more honorable when women choose it, not as life's only gift, but as its best and sweetest. When women are relieved of the necessity of marrying, they will refuse to be the spoil of the first man who wants a wife, and will have worthy husbands or none at all. Then for the first time since the first couple were placed upon the earth will the family become the high and holy thing God designed it to be.

PROHIBITION AND CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE.

A friend and sympathizer of the W. C. T. U. recently remarked in our hearing that inasmuch as the aim of our organization was not temperance but total prohibition he thought its present name did not properly belong to it.

This surprised and disappointed us for we had reason to suppose that our friend better understood the aims and purposes of the W. C. T. U.

It is quite likely that there exists a large class of people who imagine that to glorify prohibition and enjoy it forever is the chief end of the W. C. T. U. woman, and that when the manufacture and sale of intoxicants is forbidden by national law her occupation will be gone. We wish that a greater number of persons, especially those within our own ranks, might grasp more fully the breadth and comprehensiveness of W. C. T. U. purpose. We regard prohibition as only a milestone on the road to the final goal. It is but a means to an end, that end being as our name truly implies, Christian temperance.

Our leaders, like all good generals, concentrate their forces upon the necessities of the hour. They are moving forward on the prohibition line to-day because that means the storming of those fortifications which the enemy is bending all its energies to have and to hold.

Law is a stronghold coveted alike by the temperance hosts and by the liquor forces. It has become one of the most powerful intrenchments of the rum power; therefore the W. C. T. U., while not neglecting to lay siege to all important outposts, makes it a strategic point.

The tactics of the white ribbon army are eminently scientific and orderly. How can they be otherwise when they are those of the Lord of Hosts himself? In the divine plan for the evolution of the human race we find the orderly sequence to be, first, the thunders of Sinai, afterward the Sermon on the Mount; first the tables of stone, afterward, the law written in the heart; first Moses, afterward Christ. Following this precedent we must have, first, "thou shalt not" to the liquor evil, then gospel liberty; first prohibition, then Christian temperance.

With regard to the liquor question the world at large is as yet in the Mosaic period of its development. As yet it needs the stern discipline of external law to awaken and educate its moral and spiritual sense. Legal prohibition is the schoolmaster that shall lead it slowly but surely up to the standard of true Christian temperance. It is the evolutionizer and the revolutionizer which shall usher in that higher dispensation when—as our Chief said in her address to the white-ribboners at Denver—"no law shall be needed as a dyke to protect humanity against the inroads of the sea of intoxicating drink."

But how does prohibition aid in producing that "consensus of opinion" which shall write the law in the hearts of the people and thus bring about a Christian temperance? In just the same way as the Mosaic law prepared the way for the gospel era. It is an educative force, and that in more senses than one. The liquor traffic stands to-day the greatest impediment to human progress. If Great Britain and America, the leading nations of the modern world, can advance so rapidly in spite of it, what would not be possible to them if this tremendous obstacle were removed?

Fifty years of real prohibition would result in a greater bound forward on all lines than is possible in a cycle of rum rule. It would be found that not only would the law concerning the liquor evil be well-nigh universally written in the hearts of men, but that laws concerning all phases of vice and crime would necessarily and naturally be writing themselves there also.

The W. C. T. U. recognizes the mission of statutory law. It also recognizes its limitations. Its aim is—borrowing the Pauline interpretation of divine purpose—to bring man into bondage to the law that he may eventually through the law attain that better state, the climax of all Christian culture and philosophy—freedom from the law. Law has fulfilled its mission when man no longer has any desire to commit the sin or error which it prohibits. He is then no longer under the law, but under grace.

If he who thinks our organization is misnamed will familiarize himself with the work of its forty-three different departments, he will become convinced that prohibition—excellent vantage ground though it may be—is not its objective point. He will begin to realize something of the heights and depths of the possibilities which lie beyond the gates of external law, and toward which the W. C. T. U. is leading humanity.

The hand of God was in the organizing of the white-ribbon army; the hand of God was in its naming. That little band of consecrated women twenty years ago builded better than they knew when they formulated the gloriously inclusive name—Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

THE Oklahoma legislature has made itself an enviable record by passing a prohibitory gambling law, which went into effect at once. It was an equally gratifying sight to the good people of the "Beautiful Land" to see the police dragging out the gambling tables, and the surprised look of the occupants of the vile dens.

THE Atlanta Constitution has just made a startling discovery. It has learned that an entirely novel and before unheard of event is to "transpire," namely, a woman's congress, and it devotes a third of a column to a serio-comic editorial discussion of this untried experiment. While the congress in question may not be so startling an innovation to most of our readers as to the Atlanta Constitution, said paper's comments upon it will, perhaps, be of interest to them, and we subjoin a few:

"The proposed congress of representative women of the United States has given rise to considerable newspaper comment. It was to be expected, however, that the announcement of such a congress should attract wide attention, as well as adverse and complimentary criticism.

"The call for this congress was issued by Rachel Foster Avery, the secretary, whose residence is in Philadelphia. It is said to have emanated from the International Council of Women which was held in Washington some years ago. The women who will figure in this congress will be those who have distinguished themselves in one way or another, and are considered representative women.

"At this congress the delegates—and there will be many of them—will have a fair chance to air the grievances of their sex; to make suggestions for the advancement of woman in business and politics, and to assert her rights, domestic and political, and formulate new plans for her government in the progressive future.

"The delegates to the congress will not all talk at once; not more than three, we understand, will be allowed the floor at a time; so that the proceedings of the congress will not be mixed, or in any manner confused.

"We wish the representative women of the United States great success in this great meeting. They deserve credit for getting it up, and their humbler sisters, who are not representative women, will, we are sure, take a lively home interest in their deliberations, and await, with the rest of us, with much interest, the results of this national congress of women."

In the light of the fact that the "association for the advancement of women" has held congresses similar to the one proposed annually ever since the winter of 1874–5, these comments are delightfully fresh and new. The remark in regard to the number of delegates who will speak at once is peculiarly naive and witty in view of the fact that women have admittedly mastered parliamentary usages, and that their manner of conducting public meetings is characterized as "admirable" by one of the bitterest enemies of all women who refuse to be "subordinate," and acknowledge men as their rightful lords and masters.

Nevertheless, the world "do move," and if the editors of the Constitution will but attend the Woman's Congress to be held in Chicago next May, they may learn several things more.

THE statements now going through the press concerning the recent missionary conference in Bombay almost surpass belief. It is declared that a conference of over seven hundred missionaries has solemnly refused to interfere with the drink trade and the opium traffic in India, and strangest of all and most lamentable, has actually declined to condemn the state regulation of vice. Indian missionaries, therefore, have set themselves in direct opposition to the social purity party in England, a circumstance that has aroused the greatest consternation in certain religious circles here. It is an encouraging contrast, and one that should be noted, that the American missionaries of the American church, under the presidency of Bishop Thoburn, met in the same city at a somewhat earlier date and took a decided position against the three abominations with which these missionaries from other countries refused to interfere. A great stir is being made by the Non-Conformist churches in England, and the missionaries in India will be likely to realize the enormity of their error by a tightening of the cords between them and the society that sent them out, which may result in punishment that will asphyxiate their opinions if not themselves. We have from an eye-witness the following statement: "This decennial conference of missionaries was a disgrace to missionary work. It ended in Christian gentlemen calling each other liars, and came as near being a riot as anything I ever saw, and the chief scene occurred when the protest was brought in against the social purity resolution because 'it reflected on the government.' God save India and God give courage to his workers. Miss Jessie Ackermann, the white-ribbon missionary, was present and 'spoke out in the meeting' about this cowardly conduct. Some of the brothers thought she ought to come to England and 'interfere' with foreign affairs."

THE honor paid to M. Pasteur recently on his seventieth birthday by the French people has in it matter for reflection. The Pall Mall Gazette, in an editorial on the subject, headed, "Other nations please copy," says that "the Anglo-Saxon race is not inclined to do justice to its leaders until it can cut its eulogy in the marble of their monuments. If posthumous reputation is of any value to the dead and gone, great men and women have that consolation, but there is no reason why they should not receive their deserts while in the flesh. Why should we feel nervous about publishing our admiration and respect? No gaucherie should restrain us, and no ungenerousness. We boast that we are not given to gush, and we might also add that we are not given to the just recognition of greatness in our great. The difference between us and the French lies probably in the fact that the French nation is composed of individuals more delicately poised than we, more capable of extremes, more demonstrative and more ardent, be it for right or be it for wrong, and above all, less trouble with a ridiculous sense of shame. France spares not her criticisms and her counsel in our politics, both home and foreign, but here at least is a lesson we may well afford to take from her." These are just words, and we are glad to pass them along to our constituency, for we are confident they will do good; not that white-ribboners are derelict in this respect, but partly as a defence of the generosity they exhibit one towards the other in word and deed. M. Pasteur deserves the eulogies given him in such unstinted measure. The world has not had a greater benefactor in our century. Christian people will recall with unfeigned pleasure that he said when made a member of the French Academy some years ago, "It is unscientific not to believe in God."

THE Illinois Woman's Alliance has been bending its energies to ascertain the actual proportion existing between the children of the city of Chicago and the provision made for them in the public schools. The figures which are accurate, having been obtained from the records of the Board of Education, are, to say the least, startling. A tabulated statement shows that out of thirty-four wards there are but nine in which the number of school sittings exceed the number of children, and these are the wards where the wealthy live. It shows also, that the total excess of children between six and fourteen years over the school sittings provided for them is 60,000. Attention is called to the fact that no provision has been made for the 10,000 children who will be six years old by the opening of the next school year, September, 1893. These facts show little in the public spirit to correspond with that of the old educator who said, "Come, let us live for our children." Effort is being turned more and more to the prevention of immorality and crime rather than to their correction, but for every child crowded out of the public school, is it not safe to argue that in nine cases out of ten, one is urged into the path that eventually leads to destruction? Are our other large cities less criminal than the one cited?

IN New Orleans recently a thief entered a house and stole some articles of female wearing apparel. His guilt was proved conclusively, but the indictment charged him with stealing property belonging to a woman. The defense showed that the woman in question had a husband living, and therefore, according to the laws of the state, the clothes belonged to a man. Because of this defect in the indictment the judge instructed the jury to acquit the prisoner. The New Orleans Picayune comments thus upon the incident: "Truly, it seems that the laws which chain women down to such a disgraceful serfdom might be relaxed a little, so that a woman may be able to hold the clothes on her back against any thief in the city, without bursting up the foundations of the state's jurisprudence and utterly destroying the majesty of the law. When this same law operates to strip a woman of her garments and hands them over to a thief, the robes of its majesty are most decidedly threadbare." To these comments we would only add the further suggestion, that it seems highly improbable, if not indeed impossible, that should women have a voice and a vote in law-making they would do anything more absurd and ridiculous than has already been perpetrated by male legislators.

THE North Georgia conference (white) of the Methodist Episcopal church south voted down a resolution indorsing the W. C. T. U. on the ground that the organization favors woman's suffrage. Twenty years ago a noble woman said to a learned D. D. of the Methodist Episcopal church that she firmly believed that the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of their common church was doing more for woman's suffrage, though indirectly, than all the woman's suffrage societies in existence. The good doctor replied that if he believed that he should want to see the missionary society abolished. The best comment we can make upon such actions and statements is a quotation from Dr. McLaren's comments upon a recent Sabbath-school lesson. The subject is the apostolic council in which the momentous question was decided whether Gentiles must first become Jews before they could become Christians. Dr. McLaren says, "How much Christian narrowness would be blown to atoms if men would do as James did, and let God's facts teach them the width of God's purposes and the comprehensiveness of Christ's church; we do wisely when we square our theories to facts; but many of us go to work in the opposite way and snip down facts to the dimension of our theories."

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's and National W. C. T. U., sending the same, through the authorized channels, to the treasurer of her nation, asking her to send it to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

Lady Battersea, in presiding at a recent meeting addressed by Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard, pointedly said to the audience: "If you cannot be torches in our temperance work, let me beg of you that you wil' not be extinguishers."

By taking the admission of women to the great University of Chicago for granted, the world shows the silent but rapid progress it has made along educational lines; by maintaining the same respectful silence towards the appointment of four women—Alice Freeman Palmer, Marion Talbot, Julia E. Buckley and Martha Foote Crow—in the board of instructors, it testifies that such action is no longer an innovation. Apropos to this, Mrs. Martha Foote Crow remarked recently: "We have had now five thousand years with women lagging behind. I look forward to the five thousand years to come in which women are going to catch up and to walk side by side with men. I believe that the University of Chicago, starting out as it does with these broad views and noble ideals, is going to be a strong working factor in bringing about the new order, and for all this may every woman's heart in the land bless the University of Chicago, and may every man's heart in the land, the heart of every man that is noble enough to sympathize with these aims, bless her, and may God bless her in all her noble career."

Cæsar had the love of power. Christ had the power of love. Cæsar had as his motto, "Might makes right." Christ had as His, "Right makes might." John the Baptist, in the words, "God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham," struck down aristocracy. Christ, in the words, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free," announced the only method of obtaining liberty. In that great phrase "Our Father," He declared universal brotherhood. In the words, "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath," He attacked the sanctity of institutions. In dying for all, He announced the equal value of all in God's sight. Every one of these ideas is political and has uprooted thrones and kingdoms. —Hannah Whitall Smith.

One of our Y. W. C. A. women dreamed a dream that she says—and I can quite well believe—dominated her life and turned all its bitter channels into sweetness. She is on the shady side of the hill now, and is a beautiful soul whose very presence is a benediction. She dreamed that, one of a crowd, she stood in an open green, young, joyous. As she looked forth she beheld a way narrow, steep, rugged, hemmed in like a canyon. It led always uphill and was carpeted thick with Scotch thistles and the needles of the thorn-tree. A voice full and imperative said to her, "Yon is your way of life. Walk in it." She cowered and shrank and refused. She said, "No human feet could tread those thistles and not bleed. No human strength can always climb a rugged, thorny path—I should faint and bleed and die." Sternly the voice said, "It is the path marked out for you. Go in it." So she went and in a few paces were the stones and briars. But to her, when she put out her foot, a little boy, like an angel, whipped in before her and began to clear away space for one foot,—then for another foot and so on—never more than one step at a time. At last she turned to see how far she had gone, and there, standing at the beginning of the path, was the Saviour, and she saw Him pointing to the boy just where to brush away for her foot.

World's W. C. T. U.

OUR THIRD AND FOURTH ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARIES IN AUSTRALIA.

Now that we have left that vast Island-continent of Australia behind us, how crowded are the memories of the beloved leaders and workers; of labors shared for seven months together; of hallowed prayer seasons

"When Heaven came down our souls to greet,
And glory crowned the mercy seat."

How is it possible to tell the story adequately of the growing work of the W. C. T. U. in these lands? It can only be a brief epitome, supplemented, should opportunity be given, by our personal testimony at the World's Convention in June. The record thus far given to THE UNION SIGNAL includes Victoria, South Australia and New South Wales; this will complete the list of colonies visited—Queensland, New Zealand and Tasmania.

In Queensland we held meetings in Stanthorpe, Warwick, Toowoomba, Laidley, Ipswich, Goodna and Brisbane, the last named being the chief city of the colony, where we were met and warmly welcomed on our arrival by Mrs. Brentnall, president of the Queensland W. C. T. U., Mrs. Carvasso, colonial corresponding secretary, and a band of cordial white-ribboners. In making this tour we passed through some magnificent mountain scenery, and in going north to Gympie and Maryborough, we saw for the first time veritable "bush" of which we had heard so much; this view was satisfying to the least degree, in its wild, semi-tropical munificence of trees and plants and blossoms. But best of all was the prosperity of our own organization and we rejoiced in seeing for ourselves the intelligent zeal with which the departments were being developed.

We had the great additional joy of meeting the Queensland women in their annual convention at Brisbane the latter part of September, when one hundred and twelve officers and delegates answered to the roll-call, twenty-eight unions being represented, as against thirteen of last year, and twenty-six departments of work reported. The hall in which the convention was held was crowded from day to day, several members of Parliament being present through even the business sessions. The convention was entertained by the Brisbane Y's, who had decorated the hall appropriately with banners, flags, flowers, mottoes and pictures of Miss Willard, Mrs. Leavitt, Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Ackermann and others, a special feature being the bulletin board, on which were inscribed the names of delegates and hostesses, and places of entertainment, beautifully illuminated, framed, and hung in a convenient place for reference; this was the ingenious device of Miss Flora Brentnall, president of the local Y, and Australasian superintendent of Y work. Luncheon was provided each noontime by these enterprising young women, in a hall near by, and these were delightful seasons.

The Colonial president, Mrs. Elizabeth Brentnall, is a rare leader; so perfect a balance of faculties is seldom found—executive ability, impelling energy, clear, orderly mind, all-conquering love and high spirituality. The hearts of the workers do safely trust in her, and with such harmony between all the forces, it is not strange that Queensland is so far advanced in W. C. T. U. work. In no other colony or country yet visited have we found it the rule, as was the case in all our meetings here, that the chair should be taken by our own white-ribboners. This statement will not, perhaps, be appreciated at its full worth by our American women who are the pioneers in the work and who have largely ceased to shrink from the duty of presiding at our W. C. T. U. public meetings; but our English workers everywhere will give fitting honor to their Queensland sisters for their unusual courage and progress.

Mrs. Brentnall's address was a Miriam-song of gratitude for past victories, and a bugle-call for future effort. These were her closing words: "Do what you can; not what you cannot do; not what you think ought to be done; not what you would like to do if you had more time; not what somebody else thinks you ought to do; but—do what you can! taking for your motto, 'I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me.'"

Would that I could picture the eager, soul-filled faces that met our gaze as we sat on the platform from day to day, and watched the responsive spirit that seemed to sway the whole body of workers at every touch of truth and high endeavor! The picture is engraved on our hearts to remain forever—a noble band of officers and workers with whom one might gladly live and labor until the coming of the heavenly summons.

Dr. Bushnell and I had charge of the question-box alternately, and what keen questions were asked on all the phases of W. C. T. U. work! A good index to the minds of the older women and the Y's alike! Special interest was manifested in dress reform, and many inquiries were dropped into the box; this interest finally culminated in a crowded noon meeting, where all spoke out freely, and practical plans were evolved. In reply to a question placed in the box, we had urged the desirability of comfort in dress during the heavy work of the convention; a note was handed up to the platform: "Would Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Bushnell lead us in the matter of discarding bonnets this afternoon? This would greatly aid the timid ones." As we laid aside our bonnets on taking our places at the next session, a smile rippled over the assemblage, and presto! scores of hats and bonnets were banished from relieved heads, Mrs. Brentnall herself joining the ranks of the revolutionists and substituting a snowy cap for the conventional head-gear. The department of "hygienic dress" now appears in the list of activities for the new year.

A very full and valuable program was strictly carried out, and the alert attention and order were simply perfect. Sixty copies of THE UNION SIGNAL are taken in the colony, and twenty-one copies of the Oak and Ivy Leaf. The Y's in Queensland are very active, and much enthusiasm is felt in regard to the furtherance of this most vital branch of our work. Loyal Temperance Legions are also being organized on our own lines. I have special pleasure in recording this, because of the fact that, in most of the countries visited, the juvenile societies are almost entirely denominational, and, in far too many cases, we have found that the children were not receiving the teaching and training needed in order to ground them in the principles of scientific temperance; and many leaders of Bands of Hope have spoken personal words of appreciation regarding the knowledge received of W. C. T. U. methods and manual of instruction. Anna Gordon's invaluable "Questions Answered" was strongly recommended.

Dr. Bushnell's special theme of social purity met with earnest response from ministers and the general public, and several thousand copies of her leaflet, "Cause Jerusalem to know her Abominations," prepared at Mrs. Brentnall's request, were ordered by the unions for distribution; this relates directly to the odious Contagious Diseases Acts, which are in force in the colony. The work of last year undertaken by the W. C. T. U. for obtaining a law raising the age of consent, was a means of enlightenment as to the real sentiments regarding womanhood held by many members of Parliament, and the debate on the question, as reported by official journals, was a shock to all right-minded people in Queensland. The petition work, the later developments in legislative halls and the much-weakened law finally secured, all proved wonderful preparation of spirit for the still more difficult task yet to be achieved. The following resolution was passed by the convention:

"Resolved: That we strongly recommend to each local union the necessity for taking up the work of social purity, and urge them to educate and agitate the public mind with a view to the circulation of a petition asking to have the C. D. Acts repealed."

Let ardent supplication be poured out for our sisters in their brave battle against legalized vice!

They are also raising their protest against the barmaid system, the exhibition of immodest pictures as trademarks and advertisements, the distribution of immoral literature, and the report of prize fights and betting transactions in the daily newspapers; also against Sabbath desecration, the Anglo-Asiatic opium traffic, and compensation to publicans, deprived of their licenses on legal or moral grounds. They feel the need of establishing their own depot of literature, and we expect to hear soon of the establishment of their purposed enterprise. Evangelistic work is well carried on in this colony and the spiritual key-note is clear and unmistakable. Bible readings led up to the sacred noon-tide prayer each day, and the influences of the Holy Spirit visited all hearts. Parting with these beloved and honored women was difficult, and never did the prayer of Christ seem more precious, "That they may all be one; as Thou, Father, art in me and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me."

THE UNITED STATES OF BRAZIL W. C. T. U.

It will doubtless be interesting to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to have a few notes from the W. C. T. U. of the United States of Brazil, S. A., organized by Mrs. Leavitt.

The 22d of February, 1893, was the first anniversary. It will be impossible to have an annual meeting as the organizations are a great distance from each other. There are four unions. One is at Piracicaba, state of Sao Paulo, is prosperous, numbering over thirty members, and increasing in interest when I left. This point is six hundred miles in the interior. The Taubete union is small, but doing as well as could be expected under the circumstances. I am not so well informed in regard to Pernambuco, but think the membership is good and much interest manifested. It lies on the coast some distance from Rio, a beautiful and important city. There is a thriving union at Para, near the mouth of the Amazon river, in charge of Rev. Justin Nelson and his wife. She is a tireless worker and very hopeful of the future.

Communication with each has not been perfected but we hope in time to be in good understanding and planning unitedly. Mrs. Justin H. Nelson, Para, is appointed National secretary; Miss S. M. Phillips, Piracicaba, National treasurer; Miss M. H. Watts, of Sao Paulo, state lecturer; Mrs. Fitzgerald Hohns, Pernambuco, state lecturer. The work is slow and there are many discouragements, but we are hopeful and praying the Lord of the harvest to send more laborers.

MRS. E. E. BRELSFORD,
National President of the Brazil W. C. T. U.
Collegio, Piracicabana, Piracicaba.

THE W. C. T. U. OF FRANCE.

Members of the W. C. T. U. who have visited Paris, and when passing down the Rue St. Honore, have entered Miss de Broen's pleasant temperance and reading-room in No. 205, will be interested in hearing of a series of meetings that are being held there weekly. Miss de Broen, the president of our W. C. T. Union in Paris, was able, after a prolonged stay in England with a sick friend, to preside herself over our gathering last week, when Miss Smedley, of New York, gave an address on temperance. The attendance was very good, and composed of ladies of different nationalities, several being American. We brought forward the women's Petition for prohibition, and various signatures were gladly affixed to it.

The Y Branch, under the presidency of Miss Gibson, held its monthly meetings in our rooms, the headquarters of the white-ribbon movement in France. Any friends coming to Paris will be warmly welcomed here, and every information will be given them.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

Whenever a baking powder or soda and cream of tartar are called for in any receipt for cooking, better results will be obtained by using the Royal Baking Powder. The food will be lighter, sweeter, more palatable and wholesome. Food raised by the Royal Baking Powder may be eaten hot even by dyspeptics, with impunity.

The temperance work in the mission district of Belleville is now linked with the white-ribbon movement. At a meeting held in the iron room, the object of the union was explained to those present; many of them have long been members of the Ouoroir. Some who already belong to the Croix Bleu gave their names in approval, and signed the petition for prohibition, while some took the pledge for the first time.

The number of women with whom Miss de Broen and her workers come in contact in Belleville is very great, and we trust that by patient and prayerful effort many among them will soon swell the band of women who are combating the evils of intemperance. They have sad experience of the misery caused by strong drink, but the thought of banding together with other women is new to them. Be encouraged, the good example set by America is being followed.

THE White Ribbon Signal is a new journal in our temperance field bearing aloft the motto, "For God, Home and Humanity," and issued by the W. C. T. U. of Victoria, Australia. It is a sixteen page monthly and is brimful of good tidings to the white-ribboners, stimulating them to renewed effort. A "Y page" and an "L. T. L. Corner" are among the departments which, with excellent editorials, news items and temperance tales will make it a powerful weapon to combat "the giant, intemperance."

ON February 8, the first anniversary meeting of the Young Women's Christian Temperance Union was held at the home of Miss de Broen, president of the Paris W. C. T. U., 205 Rue St. Honore. Miss Isabel Gibson, the gifted young English woman who is superintendent of the Y branch, and other speakers addressed the meeting. The white ribbon movement has as yet but small foothold in France, for sufficiently obvious reasons, and this beginning of work among French young women is noteworthy in our annals.

EVERY second house in Johannesburg, South Africa, is a public bar, with barmaids gayly dressed serving men customers and drinking themselves. The need for temperance work there is very great. Dr. Helen Earle, in her leaflet entitled, "A Short Report of Medical and Mission Work at Johannesburg, South Africa," gives harrowing details of the sinful lives led by the erring women there. For the purpose of saving these unfortunates she is desirous of erecting a home, and is now in England endeavoring to raise the necessary funds to carry out her philanthropic project.

Looking Backward.

In the good old days of childhood what splendid hot flaky biscuit and delicious pastry our mothers gave us. You may enjoy as good now. The secret is in using

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder.

It has remained the standard for purity, excellence and wholesomeness for more than forty years, and retained its supremacy among the practical cooks, in the great hotels, clubs, restaurants and in the homes of millions.

KENTUCKY.

GOOD WORK.

The convention of the W. C. T. U., first district, was held at Barboursville, February 22, and continued two days. The opening meeting was held in the Christian church, which was tastefully decorated with flags, evergreens and appropriate mottoes. The convention was welcomed, on behalf of the churches and Sunday-schools, by Rev. E. B. Hill, pastor of the Methodist church; on behalf of the town, by Dr. D. Stevenson; Miss Nannie Anderson spoke for the local union; Mrs. L. M. Dodge responded, and it was a very delightful occasion to all.

The business sessions were held February 23 and 24, in the Christian church, and in the absence of the president, Mrs. L. M. Dodge presided, displaying much ability in conducting and dispatching the business of the convention. Many good papers were read and discussed, and much interest was manifested by those present.

Miss M. S. Costellow, of Barboursville, was elected president for the ensuing year; Mrs. Brownlie, of East Bernstadt, recording secretary; Mrs. L. M. Dodge, of Berea, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Margaret Stevenson, of Crab Orchard, treasurer.

A mass-meeting was held Thursday evening at the Methodist church. Miss Mildred Johnson recited the "Pictures of Life," and Miss Geneva Bain recited the "Martyred Mother" very effectively. Rev. A. A. Meyers addressed the audience in a thrilling, earnest manner; the applause which was given him showed the appreciation of his hearers.

On Friday evening Mrs. L. M. Dodge entertained a large audience at the Presbyterian church with a lecture replete with wisdom and truth, which will not soon be forgotten. The choirs of the various churches, led by Miss May Costellow, a lovely young white-ribboner, added greatly to the interest and enjoyment of the convention. Mrs. Meyer, of Cumberland Gap, with her charts was very helpful and I do not need to add, so were all, each one contributing her share toward making a good convention.

Lancaster union is wide-awake. A recent letter from Mrs. Stella Hubble, says the ladies of the W. C. T. U. have held an experience meeting lately which was quite novel and by which sixteen dollars was added to their treasury. Each lady came bringing one dollar and told how she earned it. Some had cooked, others sewed, one had blacked boots, and so on, but all showed that "when she wills, she will, and you may depend upon it." After their social, a lunch provided by the ladies, each one bringing something, was served, and it was from beginning to end quite delightful.

This union has, in token of their esteem and appreciation of Elder Frank, of the Christian church, in Lancaster, presented to him a beautiful quilt "from the W. C. T. U." He has been one of their most faithful and fearless allies, and the wish is for more like him. To a young man who has done yeoman service in building fires and showing kindness to them in various ways they gave a watch charm engraved, "W. C. T. U." He says he has done this for the regard he has for temperance and "for love of mother." 'Tis things like this which make us say, "God bless the boys."

At Mayfield there is a union of thirty-five members and a minister who always wears the white ribbon, and at Hopkinsville—a resurrection following in the wake of Sam Jones' meeting—a union of one hundred and sixty-five members.

Louisville unions have done much to aid the poor and suffering this past winter and work among the children by the Loyal Temperance Legion. Reports from Mrs. Young and Mrs. Sue Davis are quite encouraging.

We wish that every child in the state would fall in line with Miss Anna Gordon's plan, and contribute a dime for the children's fountain at the World's Fair. The idea is a beautiful one, a cup of cold water in the hand of a little child, and may there not be in this a prophecy of the coming better day when these children, grown to brave, strong manhood, and gracious, helpful womanhood, may go on giving cups of cold water, even the water of life, to thirsty, suffering souls? More and more clearly does it come to us, this mission of the W. C. T. U. is the mission of helpfulness, and does indeed "mortgage us to all humanity."

Rev. Munnell, the husband of our president, Mrs. N. A. Munnell, has been critically ill but is now recovering. To those who know and love Mrs. Munnell his recovery will be good news. Both in their spheres are working grandly for the King.

Again I ask that the unions throughout the state will write to me and tell me what they are doing. So often it is said, "Why do we hear so little about our state work?" which reminds me of the story of an old negro woman whose highest altitude of religious fervor was always reached when the contribution box was being passed. She would then close her eyes tight and sing loud and clear: "Fly abroad, thou mighty gospel," utterly oblivious to all around; but Brother Amen, being a good collector, stopped her on one occasion by saying: "Look 'ee here, how's she gwine to fly 'less you give her somethin' to fly on." Now how can I chronicle unless you send me something to chronicle?

To the unions I would also say, make use of the columns of your local paper, you will find it pays. Lebanon does this weekly and expects to see good results. Many persons who would not read a temperance paper will read an item in their home paper.

Miss Fannie Harrison, always true, has been doing good work in a country Sunday-school in Marion county. She has induced about forty, mostly men, to sign the pledge, and in her own class has ten young men who have signed. "Blessed are they who sow beside all waters." NELLIE SLOY,

A TEMPERANCE BOOM.

W. C. T. U. work is on a boom in our state, or rather the fruitage of past work is beginning to ripen and show bloom and flavor. We believe better times for Louisiana are begun.

I have just attended the excellent conventions of the first and second and third districts. The first and second districts held a joint convention in New Orleans, February 22-24, in the Carondelet Street Methodist church. Mrs. F. A. Lyons, president of first district, and Mrs. Mary H. Crouch, president of second district, presided alternately. This joint convention was well attended by delegates and visitors. Many ministers were in attendance, and aided by their presence and prayers and talks.

The meeting was opened by a consecration service, led by Mrs. Mary Read Goodale, state president, and consecration services at noon each day were auspicious openings for the business meetings. Reports from the various superintendents of departments showed the workers to be fully alive to the importance of all the lines of work adopted. Rev. Frank A. Parker gave an interesting address on the first day. Mrs. Goodale and Mrs. M. L. Wells spoke at night to a good audience in the large auditorium of the church. A grand rally of the children was a pleasant feature of this convention.

A spirit of sadness prevailed through all the meetings, for Rev. George S. Inge, the evangelist, was expected to take a prominent part in them. All were looking forward to his coming, when news of his sudden death was telegraphed to Mrs. Lyons. A friend, writing of him, said: "We think he needs rest, but he feels that he cannot take it. Keenly alive to the necessity of work in the Master's vineyard, he could not rest, but worked on till called home to rest in the Saviour's bosom. Asleep in Jesus—blessed sleep! sweet rest!"

Mrs. Lyons and Mrs. Crouch should feel gratified by the work done in their districts and by the success of their convention. Much good will result from such a gathering of the clans.

The first convention of the third district assembled in the Methodist church at Morgan city, on February 24. It was called to order by the district president, Mrs. J. N. Pharr, and devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. C. M. Atkinson, of Centerville. Twenty-one delegates were present, representing twelve unions, and a number of visitors were present at every meeting. A spirit of cordiality and genuine W. C. T. U. enthusiasm prevailed. The church was beautifully decorated with palms, Spanish moss, potted plants and flags, and significant mottoes were seen on all sides.

A worker writing of this convention says: "We were fortunate in having with us our state president, Mrs. Mary R. Goodale, state organizer, Miss Kearney, state superintendent Y work, Miss Lyons, and National evangelist, Mrs. M. M. Snell." Mrs. Snell conducted a Bible reading each day at noon hour.

The committee on resolutions and plan of work made a strong report. It was especially urged that each union hold gospel temperance meetings and mothers' meetings periodically. The appointment of the local superintendents of scientific temperance work was urged, and every effort to enforce our splendid law on that subject is to be made. It was also resolved that an effort be made by the W. C. T. U. to secure laws making physical education compulsory in our public schools. The importance of holding Demorest medal contests as often as possible, as a means of educating the youth of the land along the lines of prohibition, was emphasized. Addresses of welcome were delivered by the local union, the woman's club, the press, the Israelites and the clergy, and were responded to in a graceful manner by Miss Susie Lyons, state superintendent of Y work.

During the convention, addresses were made by Mrs. Snell, Miss Kearney and Mrs. Goodale. The address of the district president, Mrs. Pharr, was able and well delivered. Sunday morning services were conducted by Mrs. Snell. In the afternoon a children's meeting was conducted by Mrs. Goodale. A rousing meeting for the colored people was held at one of their churches. Twenty-five signed the pledge. Mrs. Goodale conducted the closing exercises of the convention on Monday morning.

After the convention adjourned all the delegates and some invited guests took the train for Berwick, "across the bay," where they were met by Capt. J. N. Pharr with carriages, buggies, hacks and cane carts. A short ride brought them to "Fairview," the lovely and luxurious home of Mrs. Pharr, district president, where a sumptuous and elegant luncheon was spread. More than fifty persons enjoyed this repast. The house was decorated tastefully with flowers and plants, and white ribbons were conspicuous as ornaments.

Music and recitations entertained the guests. Miss Clara Baer gave a most interesting talk on physical culture. Mrs. Pharr is a charming hostess, and every guest felt delighted with the trip to Fairview. On the return of the delegates and visitors to Morgan City, they attended a reception tendered them by Mrs. J. R. Jolly, president of the local union. Her gracious hospitality made a lasting impression upon the many who assembled in response to her invitation. The first convention of the third district will long be remembered by all who were privileged to attend it.

I cannot close this letter without a brief account of a trip I have just made to Lower Coast Mission, as it is called, about sixty miles below New Orleans. On Saturday morning, March 4, in a cold, blustering wind, together with Mrs. Lyons, president of the first district, I left New Orleans on Fort Jackson road. When we reached Gilmore's landing, where we were to cross the Mississippi river in a skiff, the river was raging, lashed into fury by the winds; its white caps and big waves looked like the sea. The waves dashed into the skiff, and wetting our clothes, the spray at times almost blinded the eyes, but we landed safely on the farther side, and found a cordial welcome and a good, warm fire, where we soon made ourselves comfortable. Mr. Roy, the minister on this mission, told us that the people about were anxious to see the "women preachers," and to hear what they had to say. I spoke three times in the neat little mission church to a crowded house, and held one business meeting. I never saw people more hungry for gospel temperance tidings; a large number took the pledge, and a good union was formed.

One dear, innocent old woman came to me before she signed the pledge saying, "I am willing to join the union but I don't believe I can, because I don't know how to go and talk like you do." She was glad to learn that she could be a temperance woman and still live quietly at home. This visit to Lower Coast Mission could be the subject of a long and interesting letter, but it can wait.

Temperance and prohibition sentiment in Louisiana have spread now from the most northern to the southernmost point. Every portion of the state has received the good news of the W. C. T. U., and I find our women ready to take up the new duties and privileges presented to them, and the men chivalrous and ready in helping on with the work. MARY READ GOODALE, the loss by death of its esteemed treasurer, Mrs. C. M. Shapleigh, of Denver. Her illness was of short duration, the disease being cancerous affection of the liver, and blood poisoning ensued. The end was painless, occurring on Sunday, March 6, at six o'clock in the evening. During the conscious moments of her last hours the temperance work was in all her thoughts, and she called some of the workers by name. Though death was standing at the gate, thus did she keep her vow of labor and love for His cause.

THE STATE W. C. T. U. IS MOURNING

A memorial service was held on the day of the regular meeting of the Central W. C. T. U., the first meeting in their new headquarters in Denver. Mrs. M. E. Brazee presided, reading appropriate Scripture selections; hymns sung were "Blest be the tie that binds," "Oh, Think of the home over there" and "Nearer, my God, to Thee." Quotations were read by Mrs. Teetor and an extract from one of Phillips Brooks' sermons by Miss Russell, while others mentioned the loving traits and ennobling qualities of the departed one. The vacant chair was tastefully draped, the white ribbon predominat-

WHEREAS, The Central W. C. T. U. of Denver having learned with painful emotions of the death of one of its officers, Mrs. Carrie M. Shapleigh, the treasurer for the past six years, holding the same position of trust for three years in the Colorado union and the Woman's Exchange, who was also a faithful and devoted co-worker in the cause "For God and Home and Every Land," the members hereof desire to memorialize her worth and works, while bowing in tearful obedience to the will of the Master, who has thus mysteriously summoned her from earthly labor to heavenly reward. "She hath done what she could," and henceforth her "life is hid with Christ in God." Therefore, in memory of what we tenderly loved in her, and shall evermore miss, the willing, helping hand, and her words of Christian sympathy and counsel, let it be

Only a lingering, fond 'good-night.'"

"Death hath made no breach in love and sympathy, in hope and trust."

Resolved, That while our hearts shall be inwardly clothed with humility and sorrow at our loss, the outward manifestation shall be shown in the draping of our headquarters at Denver for the period of thirty days.

Resolved, That these proceedings be published in THE UNION SIGNAL, State W. C. T. U. Bulletin and other local papers, and presented for record in the minutes, and the several unions of the city attend the funeral of the deceased.

MRS. S. L. TEETOR, } Com.
MRS. F. K. ATKINS, }

At a subsequent meeting of the Equal Suffrage Association suitable resolutions were also passed that were published in the daily papers.

The funeral was held at the spacious and elegant home on Capitol Hill, and more than one hundred members of the W. C. T. U. attended, including a large number of personal friends and acquaintances. The services were most impressive, conducted by Rev. A. M. Houghton, rector of St. Mark's church, and at the grave, by Rev. Mr. Chidester, assistant pastor of the Central Presbyterian church, of which the dear sister was a member, and a quartette from the latter church rendered in an effective manner the hymns, "Blest be the tie that binds," and "Abide with me." The floral tributes were numerous and beautiful. A pillow of white roses, and in purple immortelles the word "mamma" from the two loving children. From the Colorado union, a bow of white ribbon formed of white roses and pale-colored pinks, with the letters W. C. T. U. in delicate purple blossoms, and the Woman's Exchange, a cluster of twenty-five calla lilies, representing the number serving on the board of managers, tied with broad, white satin ribbon. The grave in the cemetery at Fairmount was profusely lined with choice evergreens,

"Love's light illumines the pathway she trod, Comrade of yesterday, now saint of God."

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE W. C. T. U. of Cranbury, N. J., held a week's series of gospel temperance meetings, commencing March 6, which were blessed of the Spirit.

THE appointment of Mary D. Greene, 3 High street, Albany, N. Y., to the position of assistant, is announced by Mrs. S. E. V. Emery, National superintendent of the department of relation of temperance to labor and capital.

MISS EMMA PLAYTER SEABURY, Pittsburg, Kan., an old-time contributor to THE UNION SIGNAL, and Frances Helen Dietrich, of Galesburg, Ill., were the happy winners of the $100 prizes in the late Estabrook pen poem contest.

To narcotic superintendents: The time for the return of the petitions to Webb & Pullman has been extended to March 31, and Mrs. E. B. Ingalls, National superintendent of narcotics, 4119 Westminster Pl., St. Louis, Mo., will be glad to send blank petitions to any one.

THE W. C. T. U. of Colton, Wash., is trying very hard to finish paying for some ground on which a hall, donated to them, is soon to be located. They ask for outside aid in their commendable enterprise as their numbers are small. Contributions should be sent to Mrs. Abigail Smith, treasurer.

ANY one desiring a photograph of Miss Jennie Casseday, taken just immediately before her last illness, can secure it by sending thirty-five cents and postage to Miss Jennie C. Benedict, 1327 Third Avenue. Also an excellent photograph of her grave taken the day she was laid to rest, for twenty-five cents and postage.

TOKENS of tender regard and affection were universally manifested at the death of Mrs. Caroline Wilkinson Allen, the first president of the Frances Harper W. C. T. U. of Peoria, Ill., January 18. A large concourse of both colored and white friends were present at the funeral, and since her death many new members have been added to the union through the interest awakened.

SOUTH DENVER, Col., W. C. T. U. was organized by Mr. John Hipp, of Denver, February 19, with twenty-five active members and twenty honorary members. The officers chosen were, president, Mrs. M. F. S. Callaway, Athens, Colorado; secretary, Mrs. J. F. Wolfenbarger, 1275 South Pennsylvania avenue, South Denver; recording secretary, Mrs. L. J. Gibson, of Athens, and treasurer, Mrs. Fannie Parker, Athens.

MRS. L. D. B. COWAN, Indiana's superintendent of mothers' meetings, in seven weeks visited fourteen towns, traveling five hundred miles, held twenty-seven meetings, besides speaking several times in other meetings, organized one union, held one conference of workers, made three hundred and thirty-five calls in homes, explaining the work of the W. C. T. U. and added eighty-five members to the unions which she visited.

A NOTABLE teachers' reception was that given by the Boston W. C. T. U., March 7, and presided over by Mrs. A. J. Gordon, who was assisted in receiving by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Mrs. Joseph Cook, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Mrs. O. A. Purington, Mrs. Ellen French and Mrs. Mary E. Cheney. The speakers were Joseph Cook, Mrs. Hunt, Mrs. Livermore and members of the board of education and W. C. T. U. Sweet music and refreshments added to the pleasure of the attractive occasion.

MRS. S. L. OBERHOLTZER has instituted school savings banks in thirty-four schools in the United States during the past year. Several of the schools are graded, so that collections are being regularly taken in one hundred and sixteen rooms or divisions. These schools represent over five thousand pupils, who have to their personal bank credit three thousand one hundred and seventy-four dollars and seventy-four cents. This record is simply of the new work in public schools, and does not include Girard college and other institutions, not under the public school system, that have adopted this popular and simple method of teaching thrift this season.

UNDER the auspices of the W. C. T. U., a series of most profitable Gospel Temperance services were held for two weeks in Owego, N. Y., and vicinity, by Mr. P. A. Burdick, a speaker of wonderful power. Crowded audiences listened attentively each night to his earnest appeals upon different phases of temperance work. The result of his work, and of the untiring labors of others devoted to the cause, was proven, when, at the town election held February 14, the majority vote was given against license. This adds another no-license commissioner to the excise board, and from May 1st banishes the saloons from the town of Owego.

THE death of Miss Lois L. Smith, of Rhode Island, after a period of several years as an invalid, will bring that bright face and sturdy figure back again to the memory of the white-ribbon women who loved "Lois and Cassie," the two evangelists whose presence in any local union was always a benediction. Lois Smith was even more gifted with her pen than as a speaker; her sound good sense and original way of putting things had attracted attention in THE UNION SIGNAL for years in the bits from her private letters. She bore her long transit from health to translation with her accustomed cheerful fortitude, and was devotedly attended by her alter ego, Miss Cassie Smith, one of the gentlest and tenderest hearts that beats. "Lovely and pleasant in their lives, in death they were not divided," for to them death is but "a bend in the river of life that sets the current heavenward."

MICHIGAN has lost an able worker from its ranks in the death of Mrs. Harriet B. Jaynes, who passed to her reward from the home of her sister, Mrs. Littlefield, Detroit, February 28. Mrs. Jaynes was successively state superintendent of health, scientific temperance instruction and ethical culture; all these, as well as positions in her local union in Kalamazoo, she filled with great acceptability. She was a woman of broad reading and culture, much of her life having been spent in teaching in some of the high schools and colleges of the state. Her literary productions were always prepared with scrupulous care, and in them she worked for a purpose, either to demonstrate scientific truths or to deepen interest in those things which strengthen and elevate the moral and physical nature. She will long be remembered as a refined, gentle, helpful, Christian lady, making the most of all the opportunities that her heavenly Father opened to her.

SECURING HOMES FOR HOMELESS CHILDREN.

This work, as department work, is still in its infancy. It had a long period of gestation in the heart and brain of our president before its birth and adoption into our department family at the convention of 1891. The spirit of justice, compassionate love and tender mercy incarnate in our union must breathe upon and brood over its growth. Its necessity was so apparent that notwithstanding its magnitude, a hopeful enthusiasm took the place of self-distrust in presenting it for favorable consideration to the states' unions.

Referring to the summary of the first year's efforts to be found among the recently issued reports of department superintendents, the result appears meagre and unsatisfactory. But reading between the lines, honest encouragement is not found wanting. Renewed efforts are continued with the conviction that the work must be largely educational for the present. Another conviction reluctantly yielded to is that here as elsewhere all "best things are of slowest growth."

It has been recommended to organize the department after the usual manner and the plan of work is so simple as to require little explanation.

Our purpose is not only to provide homes for homeless children, but unqualified preference is given to a home into which a child shall be received by foster parents as their own—legally adopted, whenever possible. Cordial relations are to be maintained with all other measures for the relief of dependent children. But it is strenuously urged by those long and intimately conversant with the child-saving problem that "the atmosphere of gladness and freedom, so imperatively needed for the right development of childhood, is not found in institutional care, and can only be supplied by the human relationship of home and family."

The reminder here is that in the endeavor to lay a firm foundation for any department, the affirmative attitude of its officials is important. Recommended by these in executive sessions, conventions and public addresses, the influence is felt from center to circumference of their constituencies and becomes an inspiring incentive to those entrusted with practical details.

Our unions are left in perfect freedom to choose the lines of effort which seem most needed in their localities. In reply to appeals for this later one, it is frequently urged that too many have already been taken up to be thoroughly studied and wrought out. This is a valid reason for rejecting, or holding in abeyance one and another of our departments; but how can there be liberty of choice here? In every large town and city, as well as in rural districts, children who need immediate rescue are at our very doors. It is not enough that others are in the field before us, in the way, too, marked out as the wisest by Christian philanthropy.

The reminder is made that these children are largely "the products of the saloon," and the question is asked why they should not be cared for by the voters for the saloon, or by the state that fosters it. The reply must be that such as these with multitudes of other nameless little ones, born into no homes, are recipients of the divine life, no matter how direful the conditions under which that life has been invoked, and that it is not the will of the Heavenly Father that the least of these shall perish. Is there not here sufficient reason for the concerted action, as well as individual effort, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union?

Eight states are committed to the work, six of these having secured superintendents through whom the department organization will gradually be completed. It may be a help to these and to others now considering it to give some idea of its beginnings in the state of my adoption. Ever since our existence as an auxiliary to the National union, we have been a recognized children's aid society—the most natural outgrowth of our special temperance efforts.

Our state president has long been a wise counsellor and unfailing friend of the industrial school for girls, and interested in the management of the reform school for boys in her immediate neighborhood. The temporary home for women and children, aided by a few other women, was largely secured by her perception of its necessity, and much of her time and thought, with daily visits when at home, are given to its conduct. The result of such effort has been that many children, here a boy and there a girl, have been snatched, the one from the broad road to prison and the gallows, the other from the pathway leading, sometimes right past the closed church and darkened mission rooms, through starvation, misery, to the only welcoming door of the dread "House of the Dragons." Such has been her preparation for the enthusiastic adoption and prosecution of this department work.

Through the untiring efforts of our state superintendent, herself a foster mother, the department is thoroughly equipped with all the county and many local superintendents. Through their combined efforts thirty-five children have been placed permanently—many legally adopted—in Christian temperance homes. Where can be found a more forcible reason, one, too, more than once admitted on the statement of this fact, for the existence and maintenance of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union?

By special request the state superintendent of purity work has been earnest in bringing the department to notice in the mothers' meetings held for her work. Her appeals have been listened to with marked interest, with the result that in several instances the homes and the children have been brought together. A son adopted fifteen years ago is the source of hope and comfort in her widowed home.

A fact of great satisfaction to our National president and to the superintendent, and one to be of inestimable value in insuring the spread of intelligent comprehension of the department methods, has been reserved to the close of this article. Miss Kimball, the gifted superintendent of Sunday-school work, who has warmly advocated this special work for the children, was Miss Willard's first choice for its superintendent. She could not accept the appointment and retain her own department, but has accepted that of department lecturer. She will be able to present most acceptably, through speech and pen, its need and magnitude and our own responsibility in connection with it. Her belief in the possibility of a rescued and redeemed childhood, she has tested by her own works. It cannot be known how much of the success attending her own line of effort has been due to the inspiration of her love for the hapless little innocent taken to her heart in his early infancy. She took no heed of accidents of birth, nor of a dangerous heredity, and she permits me to write that she considers what she has done for her friendless, homeless boy the best work of her life, and by far the most returnful. May the story of endeavor to engraft upon his heart a trust in a loving Saviour's protection and guidance and the quick response obtained thereto, be always told as she is called from time to time to plead with this department of our union.

It is still a question with many whether or not hereditary tendencies to evil can ever be entirely overcome. The experiment has been successfully made in so many instances as to afford a reason why every child should have the chance. The latest word of biology favors the theory of Riis and others that "the child is the creature of environment, of opportunity," and of habit he might add, for habits are the homes of the spirit. The good word of Scripture affirms their power, "train up a child in the way he should go," the reason given, "for when he is old he will not depart from it."

A great illumination is shining down upon this and other problems; in its light and warmth may every member of our union feel that her work is incomplete unless, directly or indirectly, the life of some otherwise defenseless child is being made safer, more useful and happy through her protection.

PETITION OF THE WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE HOME

Addressed to the Governments of the World.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

NAMES. | RESIDENCES.

We must have one million names this year. Will not men and women, youths and maidens, boys and girls, who love the great cause of home protection, paste this petition on a nice, white sheet of paper and circulate it to the best of their ability, sending the names to Miss Alice E. Briggs, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill.?

CALL FOR WISCONSIN W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

The time for our annual ingathering has been appointed May 23 to 26 inclusive, at Eau Claire. Those who believe that our greatest need is an enlarged faith in God and a stronger love for humanity; that the time has come when there must be a less theoretical and more practical application of Christian principles along all lines; that the time is at hand when there must be a union of all moral and spiritual forces; that we have heard the world's pitiful cry, and with white faces set, and strong hearts are determined to minister unto it, are earnestly entreated to be present at our nineteenth annual convention, with renewed consecration to the cause we have espoused and a faith for larger things than we have ever before seen.

This new Fuchsia is the most fascinatingly beautiful of all new plants. Instead of growing erect, its branches are vine-like and trail down over the sides of the pot or basket to a length of two or three feet. The flowers are of enormous size, buds, tubes and sepals being intense scarlet, while the corolla is a deep rich purple, changing to a fine crimson—flowers of both colors showing on a plant to great advantage. Plants bloom all the time, both summer and winter, and frequently show hundreds of flowers at once in enormous drooping clusters. It is the easiest of all plants to grow, as it thrives in any soil or situation. It is the most beautiful window plant we have. BRIGHT-EYES.

BRIGHT-EYES; Pleasure and Profit for Sunday Afternoon. Arranged by Alice M. Guernsey. 32 pages. 50 cents. Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, Chicago.

This bright little book speaks for itself upon an opening page.

"Where is the boy who never said, on Sunday afternoon, 'I wish I knew what to do'? For all who have said this, and their sisters as well, this book has been prepared." The book contains a number of suggestive little pictures, under each of which is a title word which is selected from some verse in the Bible. The puzzle then is to find as many verses as possible which have that word in them, and so fit the picture. Then the verses are to be written in an inviting looking place at the side of the picture. The more verses the better, is the pleasant hint given in the introduction.

The idea seems a good one, and it is certainly worked out in a bright and attractive way.—Sunday Afternoon.

HOURS WITH BIRDS AND FLOWERS.

Guessing games are always popular at social entertainments, and two very pleasant ones can be arranged for by carrying out the bird and flower idea respectively. For the "Vogel Stunde" (Hours with Birds) hang cages of singing birds about the hall or room.

Each guest may be given a beautiful hand-painted favor bearing on one side a quotation referring to birds and on the other an enigma. The latter is called

A Cage of Birds.

1. A place of trade and a preposition. (Mart-in.)
2. To take by force and a word of two letters. (Rob-in.)
3. A crowned monarch and one employed in catching fish. (King-fisher.)
4. A man noted for valor and a consonant. (Hero-n.)
5. A bird noted in Egyptian history. (Ibis.)
6. Time of darkness, preposition and a current of air. (Night-in-gale.)
7. The first syllable of a girl's name and type confusedly mixed. (Mag-pie.)
8. A plant and its fruit and a winged animal. (Pea-fowl.)

The bird idea can also be carried out in the serving of refreshments, the dainty sandwiches being cut in bird shape and the ice cream being in the shape of eggs in spun sugar nests.

"A Blumen Stunde" (Hours with Flowers) is equally charming. If you would read of this and many other entertainments of interest, send for the MARCH number of Oak and Ivy Leaf (Social Entertainment Number).

Woolley for several weeks after his arrival. That was due to some delay in the arrival of the vessel for I went purposely to Liverpool to meet him, but had to return before he landed, on account of pressing engagements. In the interval, however, he and I had become acquainted by correspondence, and, I am glad to avow, had formed a mutually satisfactory estimate of each other. So when the time came for closer intercourse, it seemed that we were old friends. Before I met Mr. Woolley he had held several successful missions, and some equally successful single meetings in various directions. At his very first appearance, at Brecon, South Wales, such success attended his ministrations that any less able advocate would have found it difficult to have sustained the reputation gained there. But John G. Woolley has proved himself equal to the task.

Eloquent in expression as a speaker, bringing to his work all the qualities that made him successful at the bar, drawing his strongest arguments from the Bible, Mr. Woolley at once won a high place in public esteem. At Brecon every night crowds of people were disappointed in being unable to get into the hall. Here he set himself specially the task of winning the women to active participation in temperance work; and one night, in answer to his impassioned appeal for women who would band themselves to join the ranks of Christian women to aid in Lady Henry Somerset's crusade, over a hundred and twenty responded.

It was my privilege to organize a series of meetings marking Mr. Woolley's first appearance in London. They were held in a Wesleyan Methodist church, at Highgate, and inaugurated by a remarkable gathering of over a thousand people who were delighted to have Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Frances E. Willard as speakers. This only gave a memorable "send off" to the Woolley mission, which began on a Sunday night in a sermon by Mr. Woolley, who had previously addressed the Sunday-school. The sermon was one of great force and pathos, as striking for plainness and directness of appeal to Christians to abstain, as for unassailable logic of argument.

A man thoroughly in earnest is Mr. Woolley, one who knows from bitter experience the horror of a drunkard's life, the futility of his unaided struggle for freedom, the apathetic attitude of too many Christian professors; but, happily, also the saving power of Christ. Hence, he leaves no corner of the subject unreached by the searchlight of his keen reasoning, apt illustration, fervent appeals and loving exposition of Scripture and of Christian ethics. The Sunday night congregation was scarcely less large than that of the preceding Friday, and a large proportion remained for the after-meeting. Many, of course, were already total abstainers, but in response to Mr. Woolley's appeal quite fifty people rose in their places to signify thus publicly their determination thenceforward to abstain.

At a children's meeting Mr. Woolley was joined by Miss Helen Hood, of Chicago, and he also addressed a fine meeting of women. It may be said of every one of Mr. Woolley's addresses, as was said by the chairman at the final meeting of the series under notice. it was "powerful, logical, racy, pathetic and loving." Such pleading is too seldom heard and it proved irresistible to many, for though there was not a semblance of excitement or of rush to sign the pledge—and a mere signing was not encouraged, unless as an outward sign one would desire to be wholly clean—yet over a hundred pledges were taken and the active workers say that some are those of individual cases any one of which would be worth the whole cost and effort of the mission.

LATER.—Our dear friends, John G. and Mary Woolley are sailing homeward to-morrow (March 4) and I want to tell you something more of their doings here. They leave this country amid very general regret on the part of a large number of friends, many of whom are already anticipating their return for a further campaign.

The later missions conducted by Mr. Woolley have fully maintained the high standard of the earlier ones. I was privileged to take part in a very remarkable series of meetings at Luton, a town of thirty thousand people, thirty miles from London. On ten consecutive occasions Mr. Woolley spoke with singular force and marked power to fully fifteen hundred people each time. The audiences could not hear enough of Mr. Woolley's logical and eloquent pleading, and on more than one occasion great numbers crowded to the place of meeting, but failed to gain admission. His final address was a fine plea for the abolition of the public liquor-shop, and presented an uncompromising position from which the consciences of Christian people would find it extremely difficult to escape. Indeed, his whole mission has been to awaken the Christian conscience.

Following Luton, Mr. Woolley conducted four meetings at Street, Somersetshire, where he and Mrs. Woolley were the guests of William S. and Helen Bright Clark, son-in-law and daughter of the late John Bright, our erstwhile great "tribune of the people." Both Mr. and Mrs. Clark are among our foremost temperance workers, and they found in our friends most congenial guests, with the result that another valued friendship has been added for the Woolleys, to the many already formed amongst our best people. Bromley, a suburban town in Kent county, was next, and here the largest building in the place was crowded every time. A wonderful and blessed spirit marked the entire mission, and the good done can never be measured this side of eternity. Of the two last meetings in England one was held at Highgate, London, under the auspices of my own local society. It took the form of a special lecture on woman—"A wise woman," and was thoroughly enjoyed by a large audience. For this meeting I had prepared a set of transparencies of views of Rest Island, and these, shown by lime-light and described by Mr. Woolley, greatly added to the interest of the gathering. There were many who regretted to have to say farewell, including some who had come twenty and thirty miles to do so, and no sentiment was so cheered as was the expressed hope of a speedy return visit. The final meeting of all, at Birkenhead, under the appropriate chairmanship of Rev. Charles Garrett, ex-president of the Wesleyan conference and veteran temperance reformer, was a fitting send-off to our friends.

Mr. Woolley's whole mission here has been a great success, but we need his presence and his powerful teaching longer yet. Everywhere he has made troops of friends and won the affections of all to an extent that shows how deeply his simple but Christ-like teaching has sunk into the people's hearts. He has been north to Aberdeen and Edinburgh and Glasgow; to Swansea, Cardiff and Brecon, in South Wales; to Kendal and elsewhere in the lovely lake district; to Luton, Bromley and Highgate, in the neighborhood of the metropolis; to Manchester, Sheffield and numerous other places, for single or consecutive meetings, and everywhere he has made marked and lasting impressions, and everywhere has been importuned to "come again."

A great deal of interest has been taken in Rest Island. On most occasions a night, or part of one, has been given to an explanation of its purpose and methods. And not public audiences alone, but many individuals have become deeply interested in the Rest Island mission. It cannot be invidious to mention Dr. Norman Kerr, the founder and president of the Society for the Study of Inebriety, as one of these. Dr. Kerr has assured Mr. Woolley that when he goes to America he will certainly visit Rest Island. He is very far from alone in the desire to do so, and quite a number here are anticipating the issue of the Rest Islander.

Two of our leading Christian newspapers—the Christian and the Methodist Times—have this week extended notices of Mr. Woolley and his life work. The first named gives a most admirable sketch, which is accompanied by a life-like portrait; and the Methodist Times, under the title of "A Certain Lawyer," has an "interview" in which Mr. Woolley's career and aims and aspirations are well set forth, and in most appreciative form. These are somewhat belated notices—they appear on the eve of our friend's departure, but they are not, by far, the only newspaper notices. Extended reports have appeared locally wherever Mr. Woolley has spoken. At one town the leading editor was amongst his converts, and usually the close of each mission has been marked by a chorus of praise. In several cases new and better organization for temperance work has resulted, and in all workers have been stimulated and encouraged. Our government has introduced to Parliament a Direct Veto Bill. If it should pass our people would have the power to prohibit the liquor traffic. If I were asked what one thing would, in that event, best promote the adoption of prohibition under such a law, I should say a well planned and carefully sustained mission by Mr. Woolley throughout this Island.

HENRY J. OSBORN.

London, England.

A CALL FROM CHINA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In 1890 our Loyal Temperance Legion sent for some of the Temple mite-boxes. We found them unsuited to the climate of China! They were not adapted to a soil producing tenths of cents only, and no small silver coin. In America one of Mrs. Carse's mite-boxes filled with fip-penny-bits would aggregate dollars, but filled with the perforated brass coins of China would aggregate only cents.

A Chinese lady seeing them said: "I will get you some native mite-boxes." She was as good as her word, and one day there arrived two large baskets filled with twenty or more earthen jugs, each with a narrow opening just large enough to admit one cash (one-tenth of a cent).

The sight of them was startling. How were we ever to fill those large earthen jugs even when tenths of cents were the coinage to be used? But there is nothing like trying, and though very few were the resources of a majority of the members, the mite-jugs were all appropriated.

Time, self-denial and friendly visitors availed to fill every one of them, and in the month of September the grand "smash-up and counting" began. The president with a dainty little hammer broke them one by one. Each member was assigned a grass-made cord on which she was to string a hundred cash, which counted ten cents Mexican currency, between seven and eight cents gold currency. It was a merry time in which old and young took part.

There was not time at the first meeting to open all the mite-jars, so the work was finished at the next meeting. At this time the interest reached a high pitch for then the grand aggregate would be announced. At last $14.55 was written on the bulletin board. Just then an L. T. L. arose and holding up a bright silver dollar explained that said dollar was the gift to her and seven other L. T. L's who had commissioned her to donate it to the mite-jar fund. This announcement was received with applause and the sum now read $15.55. A lady added forty-five cents to make an even $16. Two more contributed fifty cents each, and the sum became $17.

Then followed the discussion as to the disposition of the money. As there were two captains of the Salvation Army present, two dollars were at once devoted to the rescue work for which these ladies were collecting funds.

Some wanted the balance all to go to the Temperance Temple. Others wanted it divided between the traveling expenses of Miss West from Shanghai to Chinkiang (providing we could get her consent to visit us) and the promotion of Mrs. Leavitt's temperance missionary idea.

As much as it was desired by some to send it all to the Temple, it was awkward pleading in view of the recent well-known, unjust anti-Chinese legislation; so this idea was soon dropped and the question now lay between Miss West's coming and Mrs. Leavitt's plan. You remember Mrs. Leavitt, in THE UNION SIGNAL of September 15, urged the need of a temperance missionary to work among foreigners, whose godless example is one of the greatest hindrances to gospel work in heathen lands; the natives judge Christianity by the people of the country from which it comes, even calling the wine they drink "Jesus' wine." Little did we think when advocating Mrs. Leavitt's plea for a missionary with the sole business of preaching gospel temperance to foreign residents, that a striking illustration of the need would occur right in our midst and affecting one of our very own Loyal Leaguers.

At the first monthly meeting a strong preference had been expressed by one girl for the Temple. At the next session this same girl made a motion in favor of Mrs. Leavitt's scheme, and was only willing to withdraw in favor of her former Temple motion when convinced that Mrs. Leavitt's plan was not feasible. The reason was clear when the following facts were made known. During the interval that elapsed between the two meetings, this girl's mother came to seek assistance for her husband who had been thrown into prison and kept there as a hostage for his son. This son was the servant of a foreigner who had ordered him, in a carousal with two other boon companions, to commit an act which brought him, and eventually the whole party, under the eye of the officials. The Chinese officers could only complain of the foreigners, but took good care that the native servant should not go unpunished, but he had fled, and the poor old father was seized in his stead. This, of course, brought the son from his hiding place, and he was soon exchanged for the father. The whole disgraceful affair is well known to the Chinese, and it is not softened by the fact that their fellow-countryman, now languishing in jail—and a Chinese jail—is there not for any fault of his own, but for simply carrying out his master's orders.

Thus was explained the girl's "change of heart." It was no longer wondered that from being a strong supporter of Temperance Temple claims, she had become an even stronger advocate for what appeared to her a measure of more immediate necessity. The Chinese president of our society was stirred to give as solemn and impressive an indictment of the godless foreigner as I ever heard. Among other things, she said it was now considered by the official and wealthy classes quite the fashion to drink foreign wines, and the most complimentary present a person could give was a case of champagne. "What the officials do the people will do," she added, "and the use of foreign liquors bids fair to be China's twin evil."

Only to-day I heard another illustration of the readiness of the Chinaman in imitating our foreign vices. The Chinese never swear by their gods, false as they are, but I was told that a boy in my Sunday-school class, meeting a foreigner last week, swore at him in good English. This was all he knew of the language, but he could swear by the true God in it.

You will see by the above that Mrs. Leavitt's representation is a true one, and that her plea is based on an imperative necessity. If what has been written will help forward the good suggestion to send out a temperance missionary to China, our object will have been attained.

We are glad, indeed, to send our mite to the Temperance Temple, and thereby obtain a still further proprietorship in it by contributing toward its superstructure, as we were privileged formerly to do toward its foundation walls.

Just a little Gumption, in the matter of washing, will lead you to use Pearline. Look about you, and see the work of your friends who use it. Isn't the work easier? Isn't it better done? Can't you see that it must be easier and better without all that rubbing that tires out women and wears out clothes? Gumption is the seeing why and the knowing how. You can't know how to wash with the least work and the most saving, unless you use Pearline.

OUR DAY.

The March Our Day is a very rich number. Phillips Brooks' portrait is the frontispiece. This is a large and highly successful photogravure. Joseph Cook's eulogy of Phillips Brooks, which will be read with keen interest, occupies seventeen pages. The number opens with a full report of answers to numerous questions by the renowned missionary to the New Hebrides, John G. Paton, whom Dr. Storrs calls "the greatest hero of modern times." He discusses Christianity among Cannibals, the Kanaka Labor Trade, and the Rum Traffic in the South Seas.

There is a reprint of Haweis article, "Ghosts and Their Photographs," besides notices of National Divorce Reform, Phillips Brooks' Sermons, Satolli's Mission, Ballot Reform, Rumselling at the World's Fair, and Miss Willard in England.

WORLD'S FAIR FREE.

Current Topics has just passed its third month, and has met with such favor that its publishers are already ambitious for the top in point of circulation, and make an offer which is certainly most liberal. It is this:

Send the names and addresses of twenty of your friends or acquaintances and $1.00 for your own subscription to 1025 Masonic Temple. They will register these addresses and send to each a sample copy of Current Topics, hoping to secure their subscriptions. May 15th next, to the ten persons whose lists have yielded the largest percentage of subscribers, they will give the choice of any of the following:

A bicycle of any make desired;
A typewriter of any make desired;
Or, one week at the World's Fair, traveling and local expenses paid.

In this offer you need only become a subscriber yourself and send twenty names, the work of twenty minutes, and you may easily become eligible to choose from this unprecedented offer. No canvassing, no trouble. Of course you can use such influence among your friends as you may wish, personal recommendation, letters or otherwise. No magazine before has made such an offer.

We vouch for the character of the magazine. Its list of contributors includes many of the ablest men and women of to-day. It is thoroughly popular, instructive and entertaining, and can easily be afforded by all at the small pittance of $1. THE UNION SIGNAL has no connection with Current Topics, but believes it worthy of a place in good homes everywhere. Address 1025 Masonic Temple, Chicago.

The Curative properties of Dr. W. J. Horne's Electro-Magnetic Belt Truss are far in advance of all other electric appliances patented and manufactured throughout America. The new universal spring is employed, and works between the pad and plate. A most important feature is that an electric belt is attached to the side of the truss. With these improved arrangements it follows that the pressure is equalized, that ease and comfort result, and no irritation can possibly arise. For ages, thousands afflicted with hernia have passed away uncured, and the physicians baffled, have been forced from the field. Not until the glorious era of Dr. Horne's Electrical appliances set in, did humanity really know the want hitherto felt.

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's and National W. C. T. U., sending the same through the authorized channels to the treasurer of her nation, asking her to send it to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Anarchists have made three more attempts to blow up palaces in Rome.

The National Sea Fisheries' Protection Society met in London, last week.

Queen Victoria started last week on the royal yacht, Victoria and Albert, for a stay in Italy.

The bill, giving all women twenty-one years of age the right to vote, has passed the Minnesota senate.

King Humbert, of Italy, was the target of a religious fanatic, who threw a stone, barely missing him, March 25.

A dispatch from Washington, March 25, announces that the International Monetary Conference will be called to meet again at Brussels, May 30.

M. Challemel-Lacour, French Senator, and recently elected a member of the French Academy, has been nominated for the presidency of the French Senate.

The attempt to repeal the prohibitory law at Evanston, Ill., called the Lyman bill, was laid on the table in the Illinois legislature, March 24, thus scoring another victory for temperance.

Colonel Elliott Fitch Shepard, widely known as editor of the New York Mail and Express, and an advocate of Sabbath observance, died suddenly in New York City, March 24, aged fifty-nine years.

A twenty weeks' strike in the Lancashire mills, England, which affected about one hundred and twenty-five thousand employés and cost them, in loss of wages, ten million dollars, came to a close by compromise, Saturday.

Charles de Lesseps, M. Baihaut, ex-minister of public works, and M. Blondin were last week convicted and sentenced to fines and imprisonment, for fraudulent transactions in connection with the Panama Canal enterprise

A most important decision was rendered Saturday by Judge E. C. Billings, of the United States circuit court, at New Orleans, La., in the case of the United States against the Workingmen's Amalgamated Council of New Orleans, ruling that labor unions cannot interfere with public traffic or commerce.

BOTH houses of the Kansas legislature have voted in favor of an amendment giving full suffrage to women. The majorities in both houses were very large; in the house of representatives the vote was ninety-four to seventeen, in the senate thirty-two to five.

A MISSTATEMENT crept into a recent editorial on "Woman's Magna Charta," to the effect that the recent National Woman's Suffrage Convention passed a resolution favoring Sunday opening of the World's Fair. Such a resolution was introduced but it was not passed, as action was indefinitely postponed, to the credit of this noble association.

THAT earnest exponent of young Christian workers, The Golden Rule, is ever at the forefront of commendable journalistic enterprise. Its latest is a gift to new subscribers of a large, half-toned picture consisting of the thirty-two officers and trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, among them the owners of such distinguished names as Rev. John Henry Barrows, D. D., Hon. John Wanamaker, Rev. W. R. Harper, D. D., Rev. P. S. Henson, D. D., President Francis E. Clark, D. D., and Secretary John Willis Baer.

BECAUSE of the unpleasant weather which is almost inevitable in Washington on March 4, Senator Sherman has offered a Constitutional Amendment providing that the terms of office of the President and Vice-President, and of the 54th Congress shall continue until noon April 30, 1897; that Senators' terms which would expire March 4, 1897, shall also be extended to April 30, and that April 30 shall be hereafter substituted for March 4, for the commencement of the official terms of all these persons.

WOMEN are given the first place in the World's Congresses at the Columbian Exposition, holding forth from May 15–21. The outline program, which has just been issued, indicates seven themes for reports and addresses: Education, industry, art and literature, philanthropy and charity, moral and social reform, religion, civil law and government. The prime object of this unprecedented assembly is to chronicle woman's progress in the world since the discovery of America in 1492, and judging from the list of noted names upon the home and foreign advisory council, this symposium will prove a worthy exposition of woman's advancement.

MRS. FANNIE CASSEDAY DUNCAN, who is a well-known and versatile writer, has decided to edit the life and letters of her beloved sister, Miss Jennie Casseday, our lamented flower-mission superintendent. Every white-ribboner will eagerly anticipate and read this volume of choice reading. In a private letter Mrs. Duncan says: "Strange to say, my sister left little material for such a book, other than what lies in my own heart and remembrance. She was singularly modest of her own importance. I used to say to her: "Why are you not spoiled? I am constantly dreading that you will be, but please never be for you are so beautiful thus." She would smile and say: "What have I to spoil me? That other people are so good to me? That is their virtue, not mine."

THE new method of attack upon the saloon which is being pursued by the National Anti-Nuisance League meets the interest and approval of many leading, progressive thinkers as voiced in a recent copy of the Anti-Nuisance Journal, the organ of the League. This League, which was first organized in 1888, has resumed activity and proposes, as our readers know, to test the constitutionality of the liquor traffic through the courts. Its headquarters are at 10 E. 14th street, New York City, and it is ably generaled by that prince of Prohibitionists, W. Jennings Demorest, whose name is indissolubly connected with the temperance reform and the admirable plan of Demorest medal contests. Success to this valiant effort to undermine King Alcohol's stronghold, the license law.

MANY inquiries are made in regard to the final disposition of the five thousand dollars offered by Colonel Crittenton to the National W. C. T. U. with the understanding that it should be used towards the establishment of five Florence Crittenton missions. The liberal offer was gratefully accepted by the executive committee, and the disposition of it was left with the general officers. At a meeting held in Chicago, November 10, it was recommended by them that one thousand be given to Denver, one thousand to Norfolk, Va., and one thousand to the Anchorage mission, Chicago, the remaining two thousand to be held for further investigation. A few weeks later it was voted to favor the application from Fargo, North Dak., and still later the request from Portland, Oregon, was considered favorably. There have been numerous applications, all from deserving sources, and it has been hard to refuse the earnest appeals. It is not yet known whether the places favored have acceded to the conditions proposed by Colonel Crittenton, the details of which are in the hands of Mrs. M. G. C. Edholm, Oakland, Cal. In view of the need of assistance in this commendable work, we cannot be too grateful for the generous aid given by our noble brother, Colonel Crittenton.

WE have often referred to the Anchorage Mission of Chicago as one of the commendable enterprises of the Central W. C. T. U. Its object is to provide a temporary home for erring girls who wish to get away from degrading surroundings. The mission has opened an industrial department and is now ready to take orders for all kinds of sewing. Sewing machines have been kindly donated and the proprietor of a large World's Fair hotel has given his entire order for sheets and pillowcases. During the past year the mission has sheltered over six hundred girls. No board is charged, the expenses being met entirely by donations. Larger quarters are imperatively demanded for the coming summer, as the capacity of the institution will be tested to its utmost during the World's Fair, because of the thousands of reckless girls who will flock to our city The address of the Mission is 125 Plymouth Place.

OUR National president and Lady Henry Somerset spoke in the Corporation Hall of the old university town of Cambridge on the evening of March 6, to an immense audience, all of whom were admitted by ticket, as it was "benefit night" for the local branch of the "British Women." Dr. Moulton, one of the most distinguished Wesleyan ministers in England, was the prime mover in arranging for this meeting, and the master of Selwyn College moved the vote of thanks. Our leaders have had no more enthusiastic meeting anywhere, and it seems hardly possible that a few years ago Cardinal Manning, Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Canon Wilberforce were driven from the same platform by lawless publicans and undergraduates of the baser sort. Wonderfully have the times changed in England on the temperance question, and each day witnesses the growing power of the great reform.

REMEMBER Self-denial Week is at hand and this is the last "call." This week is appropriately opened with Easter Sunday, which is also our Sabbath observance day. The magnitude of the Sabbath crisis is scarcely realized by even Christian people. This being World's Exposition year, the proper observance of the Sabbath will be tested as never before. The Exposition gates will be closed, but that very fact precipitates the battle of the general observance of the Lord's day upon the people. The churches alone cannot settle the question. The world has a powerful voice and greed and pleasure are alert foes. Every W. C. T. U. in the land should hold out a helping hand for the education of all classes as to the beneficence of the Sabbath. Our Sabbath observance superintendent, Mrs. J. C. Bateham, Williamsburg, Ky., has a great variety of leaflets for this purpose. Send her a dollar or two for use on April 2.

ALMOST every steamer from far-off Japan brings a letter relating to Miss West's work in that sunrise land. Already the news of the proposed drinking fountain to be erected at the entrance to the Temperance Temple in Chicago is meeting with an enthusiastic reception, and this week's mail contains the contribution of two yens (each about eighty cents). One is from Sho Nemoto, and the other from the Methodist girls' school at Tokio. This is a good opportunity to speak further of this memorial fountain for our lamented editor. It was started, as already announced, in THE UNION SIGNAL composing-room, almost immediately after the news of Miss West's death reached us, and the subscriptions thus far have been mainly from W. T. P. A. employés and members of the Illinois Press Association, although a few outside friends have given generously. The number of subscribers at last report is ninety-six, and the amount pledged is $176.70. It is desired to raise at least five hundred dollars, and erect a large substantial iron fountain, painted to resemble bronze, with drinking places for men and horses. It will be placed at the entrance to the Temple, and be just the kind of a useful ornament that Miss West would most likely approve. Contributions may be sent to Miss Esther Pugh, room 1115, The Temple.

THE MASTER IS RISEN INDEED.

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON.

Aye, the lilies are pure in their pallor, the roses are fragrant and sweet,
The music pours out like a sea-wave, pulsing in praise at His feet;
Pulsing in passionate praises that Jesus has risen again,—
But we look for the signs of His coming in the hearts of the children of men.

Wherever the kind hand of pity falls soft on a wound or a woe,—
Wherever a peace or a pardon springs up to o'ermaster a foe,
Wherever in sight of God's legions the armies of evil recede,
And truth wins a soul or a kingdom, the Master is risen indeed.

New York City.

THE PROPORTIONAL BALLOT.

BY AUVERGN LLANO ASTOR.

The time has arrived to face unpleasant facts, and not to stand staring at them like the bovine at a new gate, but to investigate them and the great remedy that lies at the very door.

Now what are these unpleasant truths? We answer: The Prohibition Party, the women of the W. C. T. U., and all who work to elect temperance men to office are always led to the battle of ballots and "snowed under;" however brave and noble the men who aspire to become law-makers, notwithstanding the amount of ammunition (money) used in the fight, victory seldom or never perches on the banner of temperance; the wanton waste of energy, time, money, prayers and hopes is enormous, while throughout our land, the world for that matter, stalks the rumseller's power and party, and the murder of the innocents, the blasting of homes and the breaking of hearts go on forever.

We can deduce from this that the people have no voice in the choice of their rulers. But you say: "They do. Don't all civilized nations to-day have written constitutions that guarantee the people the right to elect their legislative and municipal law-makers?" Granted, but it is the method of their election, the mode in which candidates are nominated for the office, and the manner in which ballots are counted that destroy the people's power and compel them, under the name of "majority," to accept a "minority rule," in turn ruled by "bosses"—the corrupt, rich and wily politicians that suborn justice and pollute the name of liberty and right in the name of manhood suffrage.

What are the facts in the case? In America, our forefathers gave us a constitution, under which, in their day, all men seemed to have an equal chance in the battle of life; but the suffrage that was put in every man's hand has been so manipulated by "deals and dickers," as the Century magazine puts it, that we no longer have a people's government.

We will quote from Secretary Foster's report on the gerrymander. In the state of Indiana, where the vote is about a tie between the Republicans and Democrats, he says: "The Democrats have so gerrymandered it in congressional districts as to give the Republicans but three out of fifteen congressmen.

"In Wisconsin and West Virginia they have made it even worse. In Michigan they have gone further; the gerrymander has been made not only for congressmen and state legislators, but they have provided to elect presidential electors by districts. In Ohio, which is Republican, they have fixed the congressional districts so as to take sixteen congressmen out of twenty-two." This district system scatters the vote of the Prohibitionist and thereby they never have a member in Congress.

The Boston Globe has this to say on the Democrat side: "In the county of Suffolk, at the 1890 election, twenty-three thousand eight hundred and fifty Republican votes elected five state Senators, and thirty thousand three hundred and ninety Democratic votes elected four state Senators. In the state Senate the fair proportional representation, based on the actual vote, would have been twenty-one Republicans and nineteen Democrats, instead of that we have twenty-nine Republicans and eleven Democrats. In the House it is still worse . . one hundred and seventy-eight thousand eight hundred and eleven Republican votes elected ten congressmen, while one hundred and fifty thousand nine hundred and seven Democratic votes only elected two. That is to say, it requires in this state, Massachusetts, seventy-five thousand four hundred and fifty-eight votes to elect a Democrat to Congress, but only seventeen thousand eight hundred and eighty-one to elect a Republican." In the face of these facts can we say any longer: "The people rule"?

Now look at New York City, for a further instance, which rolls up one hundred thousand Republican votes, and not a member in Congress, and seldom or never one in her state legislative bodies. Why? Tammany rules there more surely than did the Georges under whom our forefathers rebelled. In Hudson county, New Jersey, it took only one thousand eight hundred Democratic votes to elect a member to the state legislature, and eleven thousand to elect a Republican, the Democrats sending ten members, polling eighteen thousand votes, and the Republicans eleven thousand votes and sending one member.

In Congress the laborers have no representative, but they number in the country over 5,000,000; the lawyers, who only number 65,000 have 197 members; the farmers, merchants and mechanics have representatives only in name; for instance, a Mr. Brice, a New York banker, is a senator from Ohio; Leland Stanford says he is a farmer, and spends most of his time in Carlsbad and Paris.

With a press subsidized to push interests of one or other nominees of the "bosses," a Congress composed of men who first purchase the "bosses" and pay them to pack the nominating conventions, and the people herded in districts so they are obliged to vote for a set of men they have no voice in nominating, is it any wonder we have class legislation? It is a fact that in 1890, at the election of congressmen in the Northern states, 47 per cent of the vote elected 93 per cent (198) of the Representatives. This 47 per cent made laws for the whole nation. In Illinois this same year may be observed the injustice of the single vote and district system in a state. "The Republicans cast 46½ per cent of the vote and only obtained 25 per cent of the congressmen; the Democrats 51 per cent and obtained 75 per cent of the congressmen. The Republicans in Indiana cast 216,000 votes and elected two congressmen; the Democrats cast 239,000 votes and elected eleven congressmen."

The smoke and din of our last election is just clearing away; the total, including broken heads as well as hopes, amid the shouts of the victors, can be briefly stated without fear of contradiction; viz, the majority perhaps of the state and national law-makers are minority representatives—a proof that our ballot system may force the people to live under a minority representative government in its worst sense.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat says: "The Missouri members come back to Washington this winter and varied are their comments. . . . . Now more than half of them are minority members—congressmen by virtue of the fact that the votes against them were divided." It is plain to be seen these minority members do not express the will of the people whose rights are therefore ignored.

One instance will show how state legislatures are packed, and in all states the district plan and single vote act the same. In Pueblo county—one district—4,734 Republican votes elected two state senators, while 5,592 other votes elected nothing; 9,412 Republican votes elected four state assemblymen, while 10,304 other votes elected nothing. From these minority state legislative bodies emanate the laws that govern each state and the choice of United States senators. Is it any wonder that unscrupulous men can buy their seats in the United States Senate?

What remedy will prevent the wholesale steal of the people's will—the real rulers who should be elected by manhood suffrage?

THE HARE BALLOT.

A Mr. Hare, of London, in 1855, invented a ballot, which is called after his name, and it is advocated by Sir John Lubbock, baronet and member of Parliament. His work on the subject ought to be in the hands of every thinking person, as it elucidates the plan to do away with districts and wards, and have all legislative officials, councilmen, school-boards and supervisors run at large, and be voted for by a preferential ballot; that is, the Hare ballot permits, when there are three, five, nine or ten or more men to be elected as law-makers, in the state or city, the voter shall have his first, second, third, fourth and fifth, etc., choice placed before the names upon his ballot, and the total number of votes cast shall be divided by the number of officials to be elected; and when a candidate has received that number of votes, called his quota—found by dividing the sum total of votes by the number to be elected—he is marked elected and his ballots are sealed up for him, and all surplus votes he may have above his quota go to the one who comes the nearest to getting a quota. So on, until all the votes are apportioned and every voter has had his vote counted for some one of the elected candidates.

If there were no district and ward lines, in this manner the Prohibitionists of Illinois or any state could concentrate their strength to elect some of their brainy men as legislators; could get some one of their good men on the boards of supervisors, as school directors, and into the aldermanic chairs.

When district lines no longer fetter the minds of the people and tie their hands in putting the little piece of paper in a box called a ballot-box, then will be seen a nation ruled by its people; as John Stuart Mills has observed: "It will lift the cloud that now hangs over our civilization."

This preferential, or Hare ballot, is not a new or untried thing. The Proportional Representation Society of Great Britain has among its numbers 145 members of Parliament. Three Cantons, Neuchatel, Ticino and Geneva, of Switzerland, have adopted it. Professor Adrian Noville, of Geneva, and member of the Societé Reformation, says: "It will have to become the law that governs the ballot throughout the earth." The Mechanics' Institute of San Francisco, California, has adopted it as the method to elect its trustees. It numbers 1,756 members, and is a society worth millions of dollars. South Australia, the home of the Australian ballot, is awakening, led by Miss Spence, and the attorney-general has said: "A bill allowing a preferential choice, will soon be laid before the Australian Parliament."

Shall prohibition join the ranks battling for proportional representation, in order that temperance and temperate men may come to the front, and be placed by the people's ballot among the rulers of the people?

COLUMBIAN CRUMBS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

THE WOMAN'S CONGRESS

is to be more exclusive than most of the great gatherings to be held this summer, as no names of men appear upon the program, while ninety-seven of the one hundred congresses arranged by the World's Congress Auxiliary admit women to their discussions. Its president, Mrs. May Wright Sewall, announces the subjects as including education, philanthropy, charity, social reform, civil law, literature and art, governments and religion, women on the stage, women in literature, music et al. Forty-five American organizations will be represented and twelve English. There will also be delegates from three societies in Germany, two in Finland, two in Norway, two in France, the same number in Sweden; while Italy, Spain and other nations will be represented. Mrs. Sewall thinks the only country entirely left out, or staying out, will be Turkey.

The date is May 15–23. It will open the series of strictly World's Fair Congresses, which continue throughout the entire time of the Exposition. The congresses are not to be held in Jackson Park, but in the auditoriums of the new Art Institute on the lake front, in the very heart of Chicago. Beside the main auditoriums, with joint seating capacity of five thousand, the institute has twenty smaller halls, of capacity ranging from three to eight hundred. These will all be at the disposal of the women during their congress. Mrs. Isabella Davis, of King's Daughters' fame, has investigated the expense, and finds that from New York and points at that distance, the railway and hotel expenses for ten days will amount to seventy-seven dollars.

Chicago promises to be a veritable Mecca for women this year, and many things not organically related to the Exposition will be worth their notice. Some are close at hand. Perhaps none will be more instructive than the course of half a dozen lectures to be given in the new Armour Institute, by the Swedish lady, Cecilia Waern, on house decoration and the evolution of the house and home in Western Europe. She begins with the Greco-Roman house, expounding the principles of mural decoration, of which much will be seen at the Fair. The mediæval castle, European home life and dwellings in the middle ages, with the character of decoration, style of furniture and dress of the occupants, are carefully and truthfully drawn by Miss Waern, and their relation to the modern house is skillfully shown. It is unfortunate that these lectures, of so much interest and value to housekeepers everywhere, are of too early date to be available to visitors of the Exposition. The first is announced for March 29.

STUFFED ANIMALS.

The Utah mummies must, of course, be given first notice. They are three, a man five feet ten in stature, a child of ten, and an infant. The forehead of the adult is broad and shapely, but the back of the skull shows a marked depression, probably caused by an ambitious mother's attempt to improve nature. The bodies are wrapped in cloth of feathers, and are in excellent preservation, for mummies. There is some uncertainty about their ages, but Don Maguire, chief of the mining exhibit, believes them to be in the thousands.

The government exhibit, of great value to students of natural history, will have pathetic as well as scientific interest, as it is to consist of stuffed and mounted specimens of species nearly or quite extinct. The Smithsonian Institute contributes the only perfectly preserved sea otter in existence. The Alaska natives who capture these rare creatures and prepare their skins for market have a superstition requiring them to bite off the nose before removing the pelt, which is worth from two hundred and fifty to one thousand dollars. Hence the papier-maché nose of the one who represented his race at the Centennial. The now almost extinct manatee, formerly a denizen of the Gulf waters, will be very popular on account of his acquaintance with Christopher Columbus, who was the first to introduce him to scientific circles. His length of thirteen feet and weight of two thousand pounds entitle him to consider himself a big fish. His near neighbors will be a sea elephant, and the only properly dressed—that is, stuffed and mounted—walrus ever seen in polite society; while hard by will pose a specimen of the famous "wooley horse," who was implicated in the "Fremont and Jessie" campaign of 1856.

In order to make her "specimens" appear to best advantage, the state of Pennsylvania will rear a mountain of such component parts as never before entered into any mountain since the primal upheaval. Three thousand feet of lumber, one thousand pounds of building paper, fifteen hundred pounds of paper pulp, seven bales of excelsior, and seven barrels of plaster of Paris, one hundred pounds of nails and two hundred and forty pounds of glue, are among the constituents mentioned in the official report; beside miles of twine, and car-loads of pine knots and natural fungi brought from the forests of the Keystone state. Upon this activity the triumphs of Quaker taxidermy will disport themselves, peering into the lake at the foot, where cat-tails, rhododendrons, ferns, ducks and swans exist in artistic confusion.

PROTECTION AND INFORMATION.

Captain Farnham, recruiting officer for the Columbian guards, is the most sought for man in Jackson Park just now. Before May 1 the guards must number two thousand. They are picked men, indeed, and for every one picked many are plucked. This duty was offered to college men, with the proviso that they be of certain proportions. It is an instance of many called, but few chosen. The captain says: "It is a fact that on an average only one out of every twenty-five college men who come to us for appointment as guards can come up to our standard. The rest are deficient in something that necessitates their rejection. We want the best formed men obtainable, and men strong enough to stand the service required of them." Young men will do well to ponder upon this statement. Something is amiss when but four per cent of college men, presumably of blood and breeding above the average, fail to pass muster for service of the kind required. It may not mean that the young men of to-day are deteriorating, but rather that the standard is advancing. Practically it makes no difference. Success means reaching the highest mark. If present and previous-day habits do not grow men up to that point, habits must change. The first thousand have been found, and it is confidently believed that the remaining number will not be lacking by May. The requirements for guides are not so strict, quick wit to acquire general information, and strong legs being the most desirable talents.

DUST.

The Russian women's exhibit will contain a medical and hospital department to show the position of women in medicine and surgery. They will probably excel, as Russia is the one nation pushing women into military service as army surgeons.

The Smithsonian Institute will furnish the world with information concerning primitive Americans by a large collection of dummy Indians, dressed in the costumes supposed to be worn by them. A large number of tribes are represented, and every pains has been taken to make the costuming and likeness historically accurate.

An exhibit of much interest and use to farmers and teamsters will be the one on the subject of horse-shoeing. Deformities of hoof and diseases of feet, and the relation of shoes to their cause and cure will be shown. Also special styles of shoes calculated to prevent defects of gait and irregularity of movement.

Massachusetts women are collecting some rare historic curios. Among them is a snuff-box formerly owned by Major Pulling, he who hung the lanterns in the steeple of the old North church for Paul Revere, on that night that lives in song and story. Penelope Pelham's exquisitely carved dressing-case, which came over in the Mayflower, is also to be here.

Wellesley, Smith, Mount Holyoke and Harvard Annex will display a large collection of photographs illustrating life and work in those institutions.

"What will it matter by-and-by?
Nothing but this: that joy or pain
Lifted me skyward, helped to gain,
Whether through rack, or smile, or sigh,
Heaven—home—all in all—by-and-by."

MRS. ALICE J. HARRIS.

BY MARY A. LIVERMORE.

Mrs. Alice J. Harris was born in Marion, Ohio, where she passed the first nineteen years of her life. To a noble mother she is indebted for a careful Christian training, which has carried her unscathed through many of the perils that beset the lives of those who make music a profession.

She received very careful early musical training, also through her mother's wisdom and care, which gave a bent to her life, and determined her future career. She was taken to New York for thorough voice culture and the study of music, under the best English and Italian masters of the day, Rivarde, Manzocchi, Laurence and Madam Rudersdorff. As her voice developed she became especially proficient in operatic music, and was advised most earnestly to fit herself for the operatic stage. Her great master, Mariano Manzocchi, especially urged her to choose an operatic career, and offered, not only to perfect the culture of her voice, but to place her in the care of competent masters for instruction in dramatic art and the Italian language. She should repay him when she had made her début in Italian opera and won for herself a place among the prime donne of the world.

But Miss Harris, although an ambitious young girl, eager to succeed in the musical world, could not be induced to accept the tempting offer. She was a member of the Christian church, and her religious convictions were unalterably opposed to an operatic or dramatic career. She declined her master's liberal offer although urged with persistence, and notwithstanding she knew she had greater gifts in the line of operatic singing than in any other direction. She has never regretted her decision, although with increased experience and knowledge she is more confident to-day than ever that she should have won triumphs in opera.

Her first public work was in church singing, and her first engagement was with the Hanson Place M. E. church, Brooklyn, N. Y., where she sang six years. Later, she sang in St. John's M. E. church, N. Y., and then in the Madison Avenue Presbyterian church, N. Y., Rev. Dr. Charles Robinson, pastor. She was elected to the chair of voice culture, in the Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, Ohio, a position which she held for years, resigning it in 1879 to go abroad for study.

On her return from Europe, refreshed, strengthened and improved, she settled in Boston, where she was elected an instructor in the New England Conservatory of Music. At the same time she occupied a prominent place on the concert platform, filling engagements by the hundred, year after year, in Boston and throughout New England. With the refined manners of a lady, with a voice and a culture that enabled her to render in exquisite style the most popular music of the day, she made hosts of friends wherever she went, who always gave her enthusiastic welcome.

Her duties as instructor interfering with her work on the concert stage, she resigned her position at the Conservatory, and accepted the offer of Tremont Temple Baptist church and was church, soprano for six years. She has made three trips to California in her profession as vocalist, enrapturing thousands by her sympathetic voice and charming rendering of songs and ballads. Chautauqua assemblies, Sunday-school conventions, missionary associations, all have sought her for the inspiration of her beautiful voice, and, again and again, she has reached the hearts closed to argument, and kindled the lips of dull and trite speakers, who have surprised themselves by their own eloquence.

Three years ago she identified herself with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and since that day has given herself to its service with beautiful and whole-souled devotion. She has always been in sympathy with temperance work, and was educated by her mother, to whom she owes so much, to stand for the principles of the white-ribbon movement long before it was inaugurated. What added interest she has given to the W. C. T. U. meetings since her identification with the organization! Her voice has winged our aspirations. Her song of victory has stirred us like a trumpet that "never sounds retreat." Her solo, "If I Were a Voice," exalts the highest duty of life, till an angel might covet it.

Her husband, Hon. Wm. G. Harris, one of the good men of the city of Boston, and a prominent business man, is in perfect accord with her, and in complete sympathy with the W. C. T. U. He is a man who has been honored with public office by those who know his worth, and who is the most respected and beloved by those who have known him longest and best. Whenever it is possible for him to accompany his gifted wife to W. C. T. U. conventions, we are sure to see him in the audience, as delighted a listener when she sings, as any of the captivated congregation which applauds tumultuously.

At her husband's request, she now accepts no engagements to sing, except when she can contribute, in some way, to the temperance cause. She was appointed "musical director" at the last annual meeting of the National W. C. T. U., held in Boston, where the vast audiences were thrilled and inspired as never before, by music that upbore them to the very gate of heaven. The younger of Mrs. Harris' two sons, still at home with his mother, is also musically endowed, and sometimes assists her at the piano.

Mrs. Harris is busy with plans to make music a powerful factor in gospel temperance meeting. She has already prepared a vesper temperance service for use in churches and Sunday-schools, which will soon be published. And if her life be spared, and she is in her glorious prime of years, we may expect to be enriched, beyond our expectation, with her contributions of music and song, which will propel our work into desirable popularity and limitless success. For music is God's winged messenger, when married to noble sentiment—and Alice J. Harris is one of its sweetest and truest interpreters.

TEMPLE AFFAIRS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

The following communication, which I ask you to kindly insert, is in answer to an attack made by Mr. J. B. Hobbs on the Temple management, contained in a six-column article which appeared in the Chicago Tribune, February 25. It is with inexpressible pain that I am forced into public print to defend my own integrity, as well as the great enterprise that means so much for humanity, and which has been so near my heart for almost ten years. During the last five years I have devoted to it every power of mind and body, and almost life itself.

If this great undertaking had been assailed by a foe outside the temperance ranks the wound would not be so severe, but to present to the world the abject spectacle of so-called friends of temperance trying to discredit and destroy confidence in the great Temple enterprise, when we should be standing shoulder to shoulder to fight the home's greatest enemy, is indeed a sight to make the very angels weep. I want no newspaper controversy; this article is final. I trust it will make plain all that is necessary to explain to a fair-minded public the safe and sound financial standing of the Temple enterprise, and the perfect integrity of my every act and motive in the discharge of my self-imposed task.

In the first place I want to point out the manner in which this attack was made. Ever since the Temple project has taken tangible shape, I have been subjected to constant misrepresentation in regard to it by a half dozen persons, including Mr. Hobbs. After the building was actually begun their attacks became more severe. They seemed determined to wreck the enterprise by sowing discontent and mistrust in the mind of the public, and especially in the ranks of the W. C. T. U.

Such a great undertaking, in addition to the other philanthropic works with which I am connected, has gradually undermined my health, and my physician informed me before Christmas that unless I had some relief and quiet my nervous system would utterly break down, and advised rest and a change of climate. I did not see my way clear to be out of the city until after February 9, when I left on the evening train for California. In the afternoon of the same day, my secretary sent for me to come to the Trustees' office in the Temple, to meet Mr. Vanderlip, financial editor of the Tribune. He handed me a long document, written by Florence McCarthy, a sensational reporter. Mr. Vanderlip kindly informed me that the Tribune wanted to know if the statement set forth in the document he handed me were true, and if not, and I could give him satisfactory proof, the article should not not be published. I had only time to glance over it, and I was simply amazed at the unwarranted charges made. I said: "I will take you to my attorney, who holds all documents in regard to the Temple enterprize, and can show you abundant proof that all these charges are false." I left him with the attorney, the former assuring me I could go on my journey in peace, as the article should not appear. A few moments after this occurred I met the reporter—I was full of indignation—and told him what I thought of him. His reply was, "How do you know what I have written?" I answered him: "I have friends who will not allow my good name to be traduced without giving me a chance to vindicate myself. I have been shown you scurrilous article." He turned and left me without a word, evidently very much chagrined.

I was loth to leave the city, fearing the reporter might get his article into some other of the city papers, but my family and friends, knowing how ill I was, insisted on my leaving, they promising to inform the editors of the city dailies in regard to the malignant plot that was on hand to destroy public confidence in the Temple enterprise.

Let it be borne in mind that while the statements, above referred to, were substantially the same as those which appeared in the Tribune sixteen days later, February 25, the latter purported to be an interview with Mr. Hobbs. The former was to have appeared as emanating from the Tribune. After my departure from the city, and without my knowledge, the attempt was again made to get the article into the Tribune. In the meantime, the financial editor of the Tribune had met the Temple trustees, my attorney and Mr. Henry Dibblee, and satisfied himself that the charges were groundless, and the Tribune again refused to publish. The reporter, and those in league with him, finding that they could not get the articles printed in the form that it was then in, decided that it must be fathered by a person of wealth and influence in the community, and presented it in the form of an interview. Mr. Hobbs, being the only one of the coterie possessing the desired qualifications, accepted the unenviable position. My friends, knowing what was going on, tried to have the article witheld until my return to the city, and appealed to Mr. Hobbs' honor and chivalry in the following letter:

CHICAGO, Feb. 23, 1893.

DEAR SIR:—We, the undersigned, knowing the interest that you have in the W. C. T. U. and its great work, are surprised that you have chosen the public press as a medium through which to attack one of the enterprises that has heretofore been adopted overwhelmingly as one of its legitimate lines of work.

We, the undersigned members of the National W. C. T. U. and Temple Trustees, feeling that such a statement, calling in question the honesty and good faith of one of our honored workers, made in her absence, and while she is ill in California, as you are aware, come to you as a Christian brother to ask that you will order the article, furnished to the Tribune, withheld until Mrs. Carse has an opportunity to defend herself.

Very sincerely,

Trustees.
SUSAN S. FESSENDEN, Pres. Mass. W. C. T. U.
CLARA C. HOFFMAN, Pres. Mo. W. C. T. U.
MARION H. DUNHAM, Pres. Ia. W. C. T. U.
HELEN M. BARKER, ex-Pres. S. Dak. W. C. T. U.
HARRIET B. KELLS, Editor UNION SIGNAL.
MARY A. WOODBRIDGE, Nat'l Rec. Sec.

I dwell especially on this point, as Mr. Hobbs, in an article published in the Inter-Ocean, February 28, says: "The article was shown Mrs. Carse before she left Chicago, and she read it, flew into a rage, and threatened the reporter and the newspaper without giving a syllable of the desired exculpating information. The subject of the investigation had been for a week before that a matter of almost daily mention to one who stood in the nearest relation to Mrs. Carse; she was virtually warned not to leave the city on account of impending disclosures."

I have already stated how I happened to be shown the article through the kindness of the financial editor of the Tribune, on the very eve of my departure, and neither the plotters nor the reporters had any idea I was going to see it until it was in print. As to the last charge made by Mr. Hobbs, it is utter fiction. My secretary must have been meant as the person "who stood nearest to me." She was as much astonished as myself when the article was handed to me. As to disclosures, I had no reason to fear any.

But to return to the interview. Mr. Hobbs says in his first charge: "I am inclined to think this card of the merchants and ministers is subject to a slight discount; they certify that they made a personal examination, and the article in THE UNION SIGNAL says, 'they met together for that purpose.' But I am credibly informed that Messrs. Pullman and Armour and the Rev. Dr. Curts, and perhaps others, were not at the meeting at all, and signed the paper on the verbal assurance of other people. But, however that may be, it is my opinion that the document was not warrented by the facts."

November 12, 1892, the meeting that Mr. Hobbs alludes to, was held in room 1113, in the Temple. It was called hurriedly, in order that Miss Frances E. Willard and Lady Henry Somerset, who both belong to the board of Temple Trustees, might attend it before their departure for England.

All the gentlemen invited could not attend on account of the shortness of the notice—some of them having prior engagements. Mr. Geo. M. Pullman, when invited, said he could not attend the meeting in person, but he would send Hon. J. S. Runnells, general counsel for the Pullman Company, to represent him; even if he were present it would be necessary to have Mr. Runnells attend in order to examine into the legal points, as he never signed a document, involving legal questions, without his counsel first passing upon it. After the meeting, if Mr. Runnells found everything satisfactory he, Mr. Pullman, would be happy to place his signature to the document as indorsement. He therefore was represented at the meeting by his attorney. Mr. P. D. Armour said, when invited to attend the meeting, while he himself never signed a business document without the points first being thoroughly investigated by his tried financial man, Mr. Valentine, he would take pleasure in going to the meeting and introducing him, but he would have to leave to him the investigation, and when Mr. Valentine said it was all right, he would be glad to sign the document. On the day of the meeting Mr. Armour was taken ill and was not at his office again for weeks. Mr. Valentine, however, attended and made an examination into all the financial points, and afterwards took the document for indorsement to Mr. Armour's house, and he signed it.

Rev. Lewis Curts, D. D., was not present, nor had he been invited, but Rev. Watson Tranter, who is now acting as financial agent for the Temple trustees, thought his name should be secured to the document, as he was such a noble friend of the W. C. T. U., and also very prominent in the Methodist denomination. This seemed more especially necessary, as Dr. Edwards, who had been invited, was ill in bed and could not attend. Mr. Tranter, therefore, had an interview, after the meeting, with Dr. Curts, showing him all the legal documents, and explained the matter fully; he seemed perfectly satisfied, and signed.

It is strange that not a word has been said by Mr. Hobbs in regard to the signature of that eminent jurist and practical business man, Hon. Thomas B. Bryan, vice-president of the World's Columbian Exposition. He was present at the meeting, and thoroughly canvassed the whole situation, and gave to it, as the other gentlemen did, several hours' careful consideration. Does Mr. Hobbs pretend to say that these noted business men, eminent lawyers and ministers did not know what they were about? To help them in their investigation, several days before the meeting, all documents pertaining to the Temple were handed over to the well-known firm of corporation lawyers, Moses, Pam & Kennedy, and they were requested to examine the whole enterprise from the beginning, and report to the meeting in what condition they found the affairs of the corporation and trusteeship.

Mr. Henry Dibblee, who is in charge of renting the building, and who is one of the directors of the company, besides being its vice-president, showed all his books to this firm, and Mr. Mannierre, the secretary, turned over his books to them, showing who held the stock and all about it. So also did Mrs. Kells, secretary of the board of Temple Trustees; every facility therefore was accorded the lawyers that they might have a full understanding of the whole case.

Mr. Hobbs says: "It was capitalized (meaning the Temple), at $100,000, the design being at that time to erect a small building containing accomodations for the National W. C. T. U., which would be ample in extent, which it could occupy at once free from debt, and by increasing in value might possibly become the basis of a finer building some years later." In making this statement the gentleman's memory must have failed him. That the capital stock at first was $100,000 is true. It was capitalized for this sum, merely as a matter of convenience, so that the officers might be elected before the entire sum was raised; the files of THE UNION SIGNAL for 1887, which can be found at the editorial office of the above paper in the Temple, will corroborate what I say. It was never comtemplated to erect a National building that would cost less than $800,000, and it was only a part of the plan to have offices to accomodate the National officers; all they required was a reception room with two or three offices attached.

The thought that had been borne in upon me for years was the need of the National and state W. C. T. U's having more money with which to carry on their work, and educate the rising generation in regard to the evils of strong drink and its attendant sins. In the first article I ever wrote in regard to the Temple, which appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL, August 4, 1887, I said: "If rich men combine in stock companies and issue bonds as they do in Chicago to build grand temples to mammon, from which great revenues can be derived, why cannot the wise-hearted women of the white-ribbon army combine to put up a Temple to the honor of God, out of whose treasury shall pour forth a golden stream, that shall help to set His people free? It can be seen, therefore, that an income was the prime object of the building, and not as Mr. Hobbs says "merely headquarters." All business men know it is the sheerest nonsense to talk of putting up a building for $100,000 in the business part of Chicago where ground is so valuable.

It is true that Mr. Hobbs and myself disagreed at once in regard to the kind of building to be erected. In fact I never had an opportunity to explain to him anything in regard to the plan I had in mind, and which had filled my sleeping and waking vision for four years. He only heard of it through others, condemned it and me unstintingly and said he would have nothing further to do with it. I went to see him about it to explain why a large building was necessary. He became very angry, and would not listen to me. Mr. Hobbs says: "Although I had withdrawn from the Temple enterprise few people knew of it, and my name continued for long time to be used over the country as an endorsement of the scheme." This statement must be credited to Mr. Hobbs' egotism. I always took very good care not to mention his name in regard to the Temple enterprise. I felt it was a great detriment to it, since he had seen best to withdraw. I felt the same in regard to Mr. Wm. Deering's withdrawal, although I know no man I have a higher respect for. Mr. Deering, however, was always very magnanimous in the matter, as was plainly shown in the interview with him in regard to the Temple, which was published in the Tribune of the 25th ult., in connection with the Hobbs interview. Mr. Hobbs goes on to say the Temple building would have a been profitable venture for a wealthy man like Marshall Field, but it was too large an undertaking for the National W. C. T. U., which had no means and was dependent on the contributions of the public.

What does Mr. Hobbs think of the splendid courage and faith shown by Dr. Harper in securing funds for the great Chicago University? If he had been tinged with Mr. Hobbs' pessimistic views he would never have had the courage to undertake, even with a great Rockefeller to encourage him, the Herculean task, which will involve many more millions before it is completed. I claim that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union holds a warm place in the hearts of the people of this country. They stand for the defense of the home against the saloon, the protection of childhood and womanhood and the elevation of manhood. They must, in order to do effective work, have money to do it with; this can be secured by their becoming possessors of such a splendid piece of property as the Temple. Are good and generous-hearted men going to refuse to give to them for this great enterprise, which has been brought to such a successful termination? Not a bit of it. There is room in Chicago, both for the great University and the Woman's Temple, and there is plenty of money in the land to pay for both.

Mr. Hobbs' next attack is on the manner in which he tried to get possession of the stock. His complaint is that it is too slow I will show later, what was the cause which hindered subscriptions from coming in more rapidly. Mr. Hobbs says: "There was no difficulty in getting gentlemen to subscribe for the stock, Marshall Field and Norman B. Ream taking the most of it." This is a most egregious mistake. The difficulty for a woman to secure $600,000 worth of stock—in an enterprise wherein the stockholders agree to allow her to buy it back within twelve years, by the payment to them of the par value and five per cent for the use of their money—was simply a Herculean undertaking, which required two or three years to accomplish. The assertion that Mr. Field and Mr. Ream subscribed for most of the stock is a mistake. The sum that both subscriptions amounted to was $210,000.

The gentleman goes on to say: "Great progress has been made also in getting the stock out of their hands into the hands of individual members of the National W. C. T. U." This is another assertion which cannot be proved, as all stock—outside of what is held as collateral for the $300,000 Temple trust bonds by the American Trust and Savings Bank, trustee—is in my name, as president of the Temple trustees.

Mr. Hobbs says: "The option which the National W. C. T. U. was supposed to hold for the purchase of the stock from the original subscribers has been found to be of no legal force. There are now supposed to be between two hundred and five hundred stockholders and they are rapidly dying, marrying and selling, six of them having already died." The option referred to was in legal force when the first subscriptions were made, but by the decision of the court since, it has become inoperative. One of the stockholders, holding $20,000 worth of the stock, remarked to me after the court had decided against options: "The point of law involved is of little consequence, as those of us who signed your stock book, knowing for what purpose the building was to be erected, feel that the moral law binding us is stronger than the civil." This noble man, one of Chicago's great merchants and philanthropists, I am sure expressed the feeling of all the stockholders; not one of them has refused to sell his stock to us.

The statement by Mr. Hobbs that there is supposed to be from two to five hundred stockholders is very wide of the mark. There are at present twenty-seven; there were originally forty-five. Of this number six have died, and the heirs, all but one, have sold their stock to us. This one is ready to sell any time we have the money to pay her. None of them have married that I have heard of, and even if such had been the case it would not have changed matters.

The next charge Mr. Hobbs makes is what he is pleased to call "the legal difficulties of the plan." As I am not a lawyer I will leave to Mr. Adolph Moses, one of the most eminent lawyers on corporation law in Chicago or the West, the decision of this matter:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 24, 1893.

TO THE BOARD OF TEMPLE TRUSTEES:—We understand from you that prior to the organization of the company known as "The Woman's Temperance Building Association," a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Illinois, your main object was to build a temple building, which should eventually become the property of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a philanthropic organization existing under the laws of the District of Columbia, and devoted to the cause of temperance.

The first medium adopted for this purpose was the organization of the Building Association, with the declared object of building a temple. We understand that said Association is the owner of the leasehold interest in the building erected thereon, and that its property is owned by means of shares in the hands of various shareholders. If the National W. C. T. U. wished to acquire the ownership of the Temple Building, it would be in the power of the Woman's Temperance Building Association (if the shareholders agreed) to sell and convey the Temple directly to the National W. C. T. U., and the latter could own the property for its philanthropic purposes, as defined by law, if organized under the laws of the state of Illinois. For this purpose, notwithstanding its present organization in the District of Columbia, it could procure an additional legal organization under the laws of the state of Illinois.

Another way of acquiring title to the Temple property, would be for the National W. C. T. U. to acquire the shares of stock which constitute the capital and voting power of the Building Association, and under this share ownership it could eventually acquire the title ownership of the building.

Right here we are confronted with the legal proposition, general in its character (subject to exceptions), that one corporation cannot own stock in another corporation for the purpose of controlling it. This principle may be said to be firmly established in American jurisprudence, and while it has been mainly enforced in the case of railway companies and other quasi public corporations, such as banking and gas companies, and others, it may be said that it is by no means confined to such companies. In England, however, the authorities hold that a trading corporation may buy stock in other companies, without express legislative authority, and the English rule has been adopted in the state of Maryland. Whether the rule would apply with equal force to a corporation for profit, whose only object is to acquire a piece of property for its purposes, and to a non-profitable organization, organized for the same purpose, remains to be seen.

As to the latter, it readily appears that none of the rules of public policy, which helped to establish the general principle, apply; but as to the former, authorities are at hand which make the general rule inapplicable. The principle was first adopted by the courts in order to prevent monopolies, consolidations of large capitalistic interests, and a centralization of power in corporations which have some relation to the public. The rule also springs out of the fact that a corporation can only exercise such powers as are granted to it by the law, and not otherwise.

Ordinarily, there is nothing immoral or illegal in the fact that one corporation may own stock in another. In fact, the general rule does not apply to the acquisition of stock-shares taken in payment of debts, or by way of compromise of debts. Thus, although dealing in stocks by National banks is not expressly prohibited by the National Banking Act, it was held that such a prohibition is implied by the failure to grant the power.

But the supreme court of the United States in First National Bank vs. National Exchange Bank, 92 U. S. Rep., 122, held that a bank, in the honest exercise of the power to compromise a debt owing to the bank, may accept in payment and satisfaction thereof, and with a view to a subsequent sale and conversion into money, the stocks of another corporation, and such a transaction would not amount to a "dealing in stocks" inhibited by the general rule. In fact, many charters and general laws, authorizing charters, grant the power to own and hold stocks of other corporations, or to accept them by way of payment or compromise of debts.

If the National W. C. T. U. had a legal organization in the state of Illinois and would wish to directly acquire the ownership of the shares of the Woman's Temperance Building Association, for the purpose of ultimately acquiring the ownership of the Temple property, it cannot be said that any illegal motive is present in such action, as long as the holding of the shares would only be for a temporary purpose, and with the ultimate object of acquiring the Temple property through the ownership of the stock shares.

If authorities were necessary for so plain a proposition, they are readily at hand. The Supreme Court of Indiana adjudicated upon this question in the case of Hill vs. Nisbet, 100 Ind. Rep., 347. The question involved was the purchase by one railroad corporation of the stocks of another.

The legislation of Indiana permits railroad companies to purchase property of another, under certain circumstances. In discussing this question the supreme court of Indiana, while acknowledging the force of the general rule, held that whether the purchase of stock in one corporation by another is ultra vires or not, must depend on the purpose for which the purchase was made, and whether such purchase was under all the circumstances a necessary or reasonable means of carrying out the objects for which the corporation was created, or one which under the statute it might accomplish. As the Indiana statute authorized the purchase by one railroad of the real and personal property of another, crossing or intersecting its line, if it at any time should appear to be a necessary or reasonable means to that end, no reason was perceived why it might not be accomplished by purchasing the corporate property directly. In short, said the court, the purchase of stock by one railway company in another, will be upheld whenever it is a necessary or reasonable means to the accomplishment of an end proposed, which is within the scope of its statutory powers.

The same proposition was upheld in Ryan vs. Lawrence, 21 Kas., 305. Power had been given to one railroad company to buy the real and personal property of another. For the purpose of carrying out this power, the stock of one railroad company was purchased by another, and it was held by the supreme court of Kansas (of which Mr. Justice Brewer, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, was a member) that the stock was properly purchased and held not ultra vires, as the purchase was not for investment alone, nor for purposes not directly connected with the use of the railroad.

So, in the case of City of Bridgeport vs. Housatonic Ry. Co., 15 Conn., 475, where the City of Bridgeport subscribed for the stock of the railroad company, under a legislative power given to aid the company, it was held by the supreme court of Connecticut many years ago that corporations must have the choice of means adapted to ends, and shall not be confined to any one mode of operation.

You will see from these citations that these rules were announced in reference to railroad companies which bear a relation to the public, and are therefore called "quasi-public corporations." You will also observe that no such rules of public policy intervene in reference to private business corporations, or those which are of a non-profitable, charitable or religious character. The well-known maxim applies, that "where the reason of a rule ceases, the rule itself ceases."

Other authorities might be cited, but we forbear.

We also understand from you that this law question was broached and discussed by the Temple trustees in consequence of a legal opinion rendered by a respected member of the Chicago bar, who had given an adverse opinion, although the concession was made therein that there exists an exception to the general rule of law heretofore stated, forbidding one corparation to purchase and own shares in another, in cases where a charitable, religious or educational corporation invests its own funds in the stock of another corporation, without any intention to make such investment for the purpose of directly or indirectly controlling the management of the other corporation.

We understand that it was then thought best, for the purpose of obviating the legal objection then supposed to be controlling, to organize the unincorporated body of ladies now known as "The Board of Temple Trustees," the members of which are to receive donations and gifts of every sort, and use them for the purpose of eventually acquiring the ownership of the Temple Building for the benefit of the National W. C. T. U. through the purchase of the stock-shares in the Woman's Temperance Building Association.

The document which you have submitted to us shows on its face the explicit purpose of creating a trust in the funds collected, for the designated purpose.

The objection has been made against this arrangement that notwithstanding the created trust (to which the donors and donees assent) the money in the hands of the trustees might become their individual property, subject to the rights of creditors in case of insolvency, and to the rights of heirs in case of death of the trustees. We cannot concur in any such view. We assume that these funds are kept together in the name of the Temple trustees, and are unmixed with any other funds, and thus their identity is easily established.

It cannot be doubted for one moment that such funds are free from th attack of creditors, or the possible rights of heirs. Neither a court of law or of equity would ever decree such funds to be the property of creditors, when they are charged with a trust by the donors, and received and held by the trustees for the same purpose; nor can heirs inherit that which does not belong to their decedents.

In our view, unhampered by doubt, it was not necessary to devise the unincorporated body known as the Board of Temple Trustees, but to prevent all doubt and cavil upon the subject, we have heretofore advised you, and do now advise you, that the Board of Temple trustees should organize under the corporation laws of the state of Illinois as a non-profitable corporation.

Under the state laws, a corporation is a "person" in law, capable of suing and being sued, with power to make and enforce contracts in relation to the legitimate business of the corporation, and it, and its successor, by its corporate name, is in law capable of taking, purchasing, holding and disposing of real and personal estate for the purposes of its organization.

The only purpose which the Board of Temple Trustees would have when organized (as they now have as an unincorporated body) is to ultimately acquire the ownership of the Temple building, and not especially to control the management of the Woman's Temperance Building Association. All the funds and property now held and owned by the board of Temple trustees may then be transferred to the proposed legal organization, and it may continue for the purpose of carrying out its original aim, to purchase the shares of the Building Association—not for the purpose of investment, and not for the purpose of controlling the Building Association—but for the purpose of ultimately owning the entire stock-share capital of the Woman's Temperance Building Association. In such case it will for all purposes, through the ownership of the stock-capital, be the owner of the Temple building, and then the praiseworthy object of the board of Temple trustees may be carried to its climax by transferring the property to the ultimate beneficiary, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, whenever it shall have acquired a legal organization under the laws of the state of Illinois.

Respectfully submitted,

MOSES, PAM & KENNEDY.

It will be seen by Mr. Moses' decision that there are no legal difficulties in the way of the National W. C. T. U. becoming owner of the Temple, only that it should become incorporated under the laws of Illinois. I should wish to say to the friends of the enterprise, that in every step I have taken in regard to the Temple I have sought legal advice. One legal mistake has been made, but it was under the direction of a lawyer, as I can show.

From Mr. Moses' decision it is evident that the Chicago lawyer mentioned by Mr. Hobbs as the one who gave to the sub-committee—appointed by the Excutive Committee of the National W. C. T. U., in 1891, to examine into the legal status of the Temple enterprise—a decision which will not hold good in law; and furthermore, after his adverse decision was rendered, and he was appealed to by myself, before said committee, to suggest some way whereby, in a legal manner, the Temple should, in case of my death, be held for the benefit of the National W. C. T. U., he said that could be easily done, "that a person or persons, as individuals, can act as trustee or trustees for persons who send money for the purpose of purchasing the building for the National W. C. T. U., and when its stock and bonds were all paid, and it was free from debt, the trustees could deed it over to the National union."

I at once preceeded to act upon his advice, and, with the aid of legal assistance, had such an agreement as Mr. H. H. C. Miller advised drawn up without being incorporated by the state. This is the article of agreement which Mr. Hobbs makes so many objections to. Mr. Moses takes an entirely different view of the matter, and advises the trustees to become incorporated, which we intend to do at once.

"THUS she doth equal laws and justice teach
To woman, outraged, and polluted long;
Gathering the sweetest fruit in human reach
For those fair hands now free, while armed wro
Trembles before her look, tho' it be strong—
And homeless orphans find a home near her,
And those poor victims of the proud, no less
Fair wrecks, on whom the smiling world with stir
Thrusts the redemption of its wickedness.
In squalid huts, and in its palaces,
Sits lust alone, while o'er the land is borne
Her voice, whose awful sweetness doth repress
All evil, and her foes, relenting, turn
And cast the vote of love in hope's abandoned urn.'

EASTER BELLS.

Lent was dreary and late that year;
April to May was going;
But the loitering moon refused to round,
And the wild southeast was blowing.

Day by day, from my window high,
I watched, a lonely warder,
For a building bird in the garden trees
Or a flower in the sheltered border.

But I only heard the chilly rain
On the roof of my chamber beating,
Or the wild sea-wind to the tossing boughs
Its wail of wreck repeating;

And said, "Ah, me! 'tis a weary world,
This cheerless April weather;
The beautiful things will droop and die,
Blossom and bird together."

At last the storm was spent. I slept,
Lulled by the tired wind's sighing,—
To wake at morn with the sunshine full
On floor and garden lying;

And lo! the hyacinth buds were blown;
A robin was softly singing;
The cherry blooms by the wall were white,
And the Easter bells were ringing!

It was long ago, but the memory lives;
And in all life's Lenten sorrows,
When tempests of grief and trouble beat,
And I dread the dark to-morrows,

I think of the garden after the rain;
And hope to my heart comes singing,
"At morn the cherry blooms will be white,
And the Easter bells be ringing!"

HOW THE LIGHT CAME TO HANSEL.

BY CHARLOTTE M. PACKARD.

"No, marm, thank you, no!" more decidedly. "Hansel is shy of strangers as a rule, and it's against my nerve to have the religious kind visit him. Perhaps you know I am opposed to Christianity?" drawing the word out to its fullest length.

"I called as a friend," replied the tall young woman whose steady, calm scrutiny was slightly baffling. "I am not sent by any society."

"The plain truth is, two mission schools within a mile of us have been running some of the neighbors' houses for six months past, and I look upon it as sarcy to ask folks if they are bringing up their families right; I mean respectable, clean folks. It's my affair and Hansel's, not the missioners!"

The big door was still held half open by an iron hand, as if the fair enemy were about to storm the fortress. Instead the cover of a wicker basket, carefully held by the unknown, was lifted, displaying a pot of fragrant violets. At this sight the large, hard, florid face took on an expression of pleasure.

"Violets? Why, my Hansel is just wild over 'em. I said I would buy him some the very first chance. I suppose you may as well walk in, if you please," Mrs. Stern added in spite of herself, seeing that it was "a born lady" whose errand she had nearly refused to listen to.

The second floor of the very respectable tenement in Greely's Court was clean and light, for Mrs. Stern was a well-to-do working woman with money in the bank and a fund of strength and energy in herself. Miss Altman exclaimed, as did most persons when first ushered into an odd-shaped room that seemed half window, "How sunny, and cheerful and queer it is!"

"I took the rent because of this corner bedroom; a watchmaker fixed it up for his trade, and my boy lives mostly on light and air. Of course, you have heard about him? That's what brought you, certain." The mother sent a swift glance forward to discover the wish of her Hansel when the strange lady entered.

The cripple, a lad of sixteen, was seated beside a table littered with dainty shavings and the small tools used by him in carving. Nature sometimes atones for the lack of a common gift by the bestowal of an uncommon one, and Hansel's delicate hands wrought magic in wood. The fine head and face rising above his stunted body were fit for an artist's study, and although a world of free delight was shut forever away from him, he watched the school children playing in the small yard opposite with a sigh of wonder and curiosity rather than of pain. He looked up with a gentle movement of welcome as Miss Altman advanced with a courteous and friendly greeting.

"Our Dr. Allen invited me to call upon you, and I have brought—this," placing the white jar of English violets before him. Laughingly then she turned to Mrs. Stern: "You are often reminded of violets, are you not, in this room?"

The woman's grim mouth relaxed, and the lines of her rather stolid face were suffused with the expression of her deep mother-love and pride, her one worship. Hansel's wonderful blue eyes, shaded by dark, silken lashes, were a surprise of beauty, day by day, to her. Although the boy smiled with rising color at the implied compliment, vanity was not his temptation; he turned his radiant glance from the delicious blossoms to inquire:

"Is he your doctor as well as mine? I suppose his patients always love him, but I—he first taught me to do something in the world!"

"Ah, yes," Miss Altman said brightly, looking at the white, trembling fingers, absently, however. "Five years ago I was laid on my bed for a year, hopeless, but his skill and his sympathy brought me up and out again. I like now to visit other invalids, and, if I may, encourage them—with violets—possibly. I like new friends, do not you? Dr. Allen mentioned your delight in plants."

"A curious story," the physician had explained to Miss Altman, when by chance he named the cripple to her one day. "The father of Hansel Stern was a German rationalist, an unlucky, fiery, but able man. And the mother, an American, is a tougher heathen than her husband, who got himself blown up on some fête day. Her temper is of the worst when stirred, yet she is all gentleness to her cripple, and is by no means a bad sort to deal with if you start her on the right track. The boy is sweetness and light and pluck."

Mary Altman seldom blundered, thanks to native tact and training, and she had made a good beginning with the Sterns, mother and son. They were keenly attentive, observing her fine, plain, gray suit; the absence of jewelry except one ring on her firm white hand, from which she drew the glove to examine a toy ship, also the womanly power and comeliness of her expressive face. When she fell to talking of a long stay in Switzerland, where she visited and talked with the men whose work is admired the world over, Hansel and his mother exchanged pleased glances. Here was an acquaintance worth having.

"I wasn't for letting her in," Mrs. Stern owned frankly, as they saw their guest turn the corner, where her carriage awaited her. "She is one of the rich Altmans, up town; there are two brothers that live like princes, but then there's a difference in moneyed people, as I tell Heideman when he says it is wicked to be rich."

A troubled frown crept over Hansel's forehead and gave him the look of an old man. "I am tired of that talk, mammy, and she is as sweet as her violets, else why did she fetch them to me? Do you hate everybody that is not poor and hard-worked? Old Heideman is lazy; I will say that for him!"

"Heideman is helping to bring about a new order of things. He has to work in secret, mostly, but never tell of it or the plans will fail. Religion is to blame for half our troubles, making men so unreasonable."

"Aye, aye, I care nothing for it; but one day, just for curiosity, I must read the Bible and see what its fables are like. I have had Grimm and the Arabian Nights."

"Well," answered his mother doubtfully. "They are lively books and the Bible is dull, you quickly tire of it. Miss Altman had no word about it, you see. She is a wise woman."

From this date the visits to Greely's Court interested the heiress whose life flowed in so many channels, scarcely less than the bright-eyed cripple to whom she gave an inspiration unlike any that had preceded it in his life. Mrs. Stern was an adept in doing up fine muslins and laces, and from her rich patrons she caught many ideas of politeness, of what the world expects of the gentleman, always with reference to Hansel, who should have been, she thought, a nobleman's son. She taught the boy better manners than she put into actual practice herself, and by means of circulating libraries secured the books he enjoyed, histories, a little science, a good deal of poetry, and of course much German literature, good and bad. Miss Altman by degrees took the measure of his attainments. When alone together they talked over the great questions of "work and wages," of a "mischievous church" and its influence on society. A living and yearning soul shut within the prison of cold, dark heathenism; such was Hansel Stern's when Providence sent this Christian friend to turn, if possible, his captivity into freedom.

"Anarchist or Christian! Which shall it be?" Mary Altman asked again and again in the months that followed her entrance to Greely's Court. To begin with, Hansel was too old for a lad not seventeen. Mrs. Stern feared the laughter or ridicule of the children she knew best, never having tried to enlist the ready sympathy of even rough boys and girls. Miss Altman judged that near neighbors were to be won over, as it is doubtful policy to import from a higher class occasional visitors only. She visited the public school at hand, and chanced to pick out two good-looking boys who passed the corner overlooked by Hansel each day. At the close of the school they were called up to be introduced to the lady who was "awfully easy to talk to!" as Nick Waters declared.

"Hansel, the cripple" had furnished much conversation to the persons forbidden a closer acquaintance. Mrs. Stern and her odd visitors awoke curiosity so mixed with dread, that a mere breath of the gossip spinning round them reached those most concerned.

With beating hearts the lads, whom Miss Altman left to introduce themselves, while she occupied Hansel's mother one day, entered the bright chamber, but the way was smoothed for their bashfulness and Hansel chatted as fast as any boy of sound body.

"We'd have come sooner, only we thought maybe you liked to study all the time!" explained Jack Hart. "I see you way up here when we play ball over yonder."

"Study!" burst forth his mate; "won't you just look at that apple woman with her basket—two inches high! Old Nance ought to see her figger to the life."

Thus began another chapter of Hansel's new experiences. He had not asked, nor had any one ventured to describe the games in which healthy young creatures delight; but now he listened eagerly when Jack or Nick gave points on their sports, brought school difficulties or puzzling lessons to him, and, by degrees, Hansel came to think of himself as a boy also. Heideman, his father's ally, had taught him to play the flute, and as his interest in others grew, he liked to play with windows open to the court for all who cared to listen.

As yet Mary Altman had not talked religion, as Mrs. Stern at first had expected and prophesied. Often she appeared deaf to the arguments against it; and the arguments for bringing employer and employed to the same level called out as faint a reply as civility required. The subject uppermost in Mrs. Stern's mind had so long been the overthrow of existing institutions, that the woman planted her defences where there was no attack. And she watched more curiously the specimen of that aristocracy which, she told herself, oppressed the laborer without cause. What was Mary Altman's secret purpose?

Very suddenly once, as the experiment of taking Hansel a drive out of city limits was being tried, and from his pile of cushions the brilliant eyes roved here and there over the fresh, lovely scenes on either hand, Miss Altman felt the intense gaze fasten upon her face, and the tired voice demanded:

"Are you a Christian?" then quite simply and as a matter of course: "My mother says she never knew one who did not blow people up!"

The merry laugh that met this solemn statement disturbed the cripple; his color rose and his friend hurried to say with much seriousness:

"I call myself a Christian; the disciple of a very gentle Master, why should I be violent? It pains me when I find people ignorant of the dear Lord Jesus; it does not anger me, only I do long to bring them to Him!"

"Heideman stamps his feet and shouts when he is contradicted, and I am not like that," the boy said, as if thinking aloud and contrasting two methods. "He says Christianity is doomed for certain; but Heideman is my father's good friend and he would shoot any one who lorded it over mother or me—if we asked him to shoot!"

"You never before saw wild flowers growing as they do in this lane, Hansel, real hedges of asters and golden-rod, and those scarlet berries? The shadows on those blue hills—are they not exquisite? Who made them, do you fancy? I believe in a wonderful Love, beyond all the world's, in and about us; and when you ask me why I ever sought you out and learned ways of helping you and others, I tell you, to-day, my religion drove me to it! It will not suffer me to work only for my selfish pleasure; it tells me that I must love the whole world for which the Lord Christ lived and died."

For answer, the lad dropped his head upon the cushions while his eyes took the direction of hers. The rich afternoon was filled with voices that reached farther than that of his kind friend, and the waves of light flowing over the peaceful landscape seemed to flood his inmost heart.

Early in the winter Mary Altman left home for a long absence. Hansel was depressed by her going, and one day said to his mother with an air of decision: "I would like now to read the Bible. Will you buy me one?"

Mrs. Stern went to Heideman with the matter and he answered her with bent brows:

"I tinks, mine good vrend, the fine young lady is truly that vulf in sheep's clodings! She mak' one Christian of your Hansel, and separate moder and shild. I soospec that polite young lady from the very first day."

"You are wrong!" declared Mrs. Stern shortly. "I have watched and I have listened at the doors; trust me for that! But Miss Altman has not talked religion to Hansel. She is a good woman," was added in a lower tone, as if to herself.

Heideman sighed as if her statement had been quite the reverse. "I hev observe, mine vrend Hannah, that dings one must not have is the dings one cannot live widout. So I will bring ze Bible; we must trust Fritz's son, who is no fool, I will confess!" Heideman gave the book into Hansel's eager hold with smiles and an assumed carelessness.

"You will find it to please in places," he pronounced, nodding his great head bristling with stiff, yellow hair, "and many druly good sayings; but it is fable joost the same, remember, and no druth. I will call for the book soon, when you hev toss it aside."

Alone in his room Hansel Stern began the Testament, so familiar to children of Christian training, so entirely new to him. Chapter after chapter his fingers turned while his cheeks flushed and the deep violet eyes shone with strange delight. The key of life was here, and the Master of whom Miss Altman had spoken once to such effect, appeared to this hungry learner as One indeed altogether lovely. The lad's reason had been sharpened; his moral nature was ever sensitive to wrong and right as he spelled them out; but a chord scarcely touched until now, trembled into full harmony.

Mrs. Stern would instantly have noticed her son's excitement if a more serious trouble had not fully occupied her mind, returning at dusk that evening.

"Hansel!" she began, before taking off her bonnet, "there has been a strike on the railroad to F——, and Mr. Altman's grand new summer house was burned at midnight. He is president of the road, you know."

"Mr. Altman's house? Oh, mother!"

"Yes, and Heideman is arrested for complicity in the riot; but—Hansel, he could not have encouraged their starting the fire? Could he?"

Hansel was amazed at the question; that noisy German had so controlled their personal affairs, he expected his mother's usual angry defence of his ways. Her voice, however, was almost timid, and she panted for breath. Facts in the German's private history, confided to her at intervals, had shaken her faith in his absolute trustworthiness. He was possibly insane upon the social questions, and Mrs. Stern feared being classed with anarchists, even if her Fritz, himself, sympathized with them.

"Well," she remarked, after a pause, studying her lad's perplexed face, "Miss Altman will not enter our house again if she gets an idea that our friends were mixed up in the matter of burning buildings. She will hate those who harmed her father of ill-will!"

"She does not hate, and to-day I have learned the reason why she does not."

Hansel's eyes shone, but his mother took no notice of the remark, nor did she allude to the Bible readings in the weeks succeeding, while Heideman and his companions were under the detaining hand of the law. Mrs. Stern was terribly uneasy until Heideman was discharged, and the day after sailed for Germany, with but hurried good-byes to mother and son.

Miss Altman did not return until Easter was quite near at hand. She had written to Hansel occasionally, and through others sent him tokens of her continued interest. Jack and Nick proved capital mates, with Hansel's leave drawing in two or three other boys, who tried at first to act like girls in the cripple's work-shop, but soon found that a little noise and "a real good time" did not annoy Hansel or his mother, whose harshness was not now a thing to dread. When Miss Altman came at length, bringing another flower pot, containing an Easter lily bursting with buds, she exclaimed, with pleasure:

"You look like another person, Hansel! How much stronger and happier! Why, the knot between your eyes has gone!"

The fine face of the cripple had indeed taken on new brightness and peace. The months of their separation had wrought beneficently for soul and body, as the two react upon one another. Mrs. Stern left the friends alone together without scruple, and when, at the end of an hour, she entered Hansel's room, Miss Altman turned to her quite confidently, remarking:

"I have invited your lad to go to church with me Easter Sunday. Our pew is near one of the doors, so that if he gets weary he can easily be helped out. I notice how much he uses his crutches; that is real gain!"

"Yes, he is gaining steadily. It shall be just as he says about the church; I see that his religion agrees with him, and anyway, he is old enough to decide such matters for himself."

Hansel almost counted the hours from that afternoon, and never was a lily watched with keener satisfaction. It was to be his first offering at the divine altar, when he entered the Lord's house for the first time.

"Afterward, I want the lily to be carried to some hospital for ones like me," the boy said, with moistened eyes, and Mary Altman promised that it should be so disposed of.

The noble old church of St. Peter, where the Altmans for three generations had worshiped, was not too elaborately decorated with the hopeful blossoms of spring. From his appointed corner Hansel Stern took in the solemn beauty and gladness of the occasion,—the organ music swelling up to the arched roof, the melody of unseen singers proclaiming, "Christ, the Lord, is risen today," and the bishop reading and explaining the mystery of our Lord's death, uprising and eternal life among His own.

A stout woman in an obscure place in a gallery also saw and heard. Sunlight streaming through a stained window touched her Hansel's head, and the figure of the Good Shepherd, brought forth in clear relief, seemed standing as silent guard over him.

"If there is a blessing to be had, let him have it," she muttered, with a sob in her throat. "Maybe I'd like the feeling of it myself, but I am too old to change."

At that very moment the cripple, with his illuminated face, was telling off upon his fingers the words last committed by him:

"I believe in the Holy Ghost; the Holy Catholic church; the communion of saints; the forgiveness of sins; the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting."

TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

BIBLE CLASS LESSON OF MRS. SARAH B. COOPER.

A very large concourse of parents was present at Mrs. Cooper's Bible class on March 19, and took part in the important discussion in regard to the "Training of Children." If you would have a child avoid evil habits, said Mrs. Cooper, teach him good habits to start with. Work to have the heart right; for out of the heart are the issues of life.

Teach a child self-government at the earliest possible point of time. Teach a child reverence for his superiors. There is too little reverence in these modern days. Teach a child obedience. The first lesson God ever gave to man was a lesson of obedience. Filial, affectionate children are blossoms of joy in the household. There is an excess of hopefulness in early youth that often runs into audacity. The average boy thinks he knows more at eighteen than he will know at sixty.

Great wisdom is needed on the part of parents. Paul was an old bachelor, but he showed an amazing amount of good sense in regard to the training of children. He said: "Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Train them! Nurture them! What pains are taken with young trees and young colts. Only little, neglected children are left to "come up" as they will. Christ said: "Take heed that ye offend not one of these little ones." We are to bring them up for citizenship in the heavenly world as well as this world.

A vast number of questions was asked in regard to methods of training. Mr. Cooper said: "All true family government has for its end and aim self-government. The child is an apprentice. He is not born with the trade of conduct learned. Parents wait very patiently for the physical development of their children. The whole family is interested in the baby's first attempt at walking, and all the neighbors are informed of the first successful effort at climbing up stairs. Children must learn to use their faculties as they learn to use their limbs. They must learn to climb the stairs of moral difficulty, as they learn to climb the household stairs."

Another question was asked as to children being born totally depraved. Mrs. Cooper replied with much earnestness: "It is an awful doctrine to teach that children are born totally depraved. It is diametrically opposed to the teaching of Christ on the subject. He said: 'Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.' 'Whosoever receiveth a little child in My name, receiveth Me.' I believe Christ's teachings. Let us receive the little children as Christ received them. Let us train them.

"Do not carry your children. Teach them to judge for themselves, else you will make moral cripples of them. Better let them make mistakes under your watchful supervision, and thus their mistakes may be made their helpers. You do not want a child like a machine-doll, that goes all right when it is wound up."

The last part of the lesson was devoted to the choice of associates. It is more dangerous for children to go with moral lunatics than with mental lunatics. A vigorous plea was made for the doing away with the pestilential pools of intemperance, vice and crime, that meet the young at every turn in large cities. Parents should know where their children are. Darkness is danger for the young. Guard the children after the sun goes down with unflinching care. The manliest men I have ever known have been the most tender and reverent to their parents.

Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? —Jas. 2:22.

The mite-box collections come in with fine results. The Philadelphia, Pa., W. C. T. U. sends $70.90 as the sum of its opening. G. W. Barnes, Richville, N. Y., writes: "Enclosed please find $4 from our mite-box. My precious wife went home five months ago and in her purse was found $2, which seems too sacred for common use; so we sent for a mite-box in memory of her love for the white ribbon and the Temple." Mrs. A. S. Miley, of Norfolk, Va., says: "I send herein $17 from Brambleton union; $2.01 is from one member's mite-box, the balance from a ten-cent bank which holds $5, and from my own box. If it were only as many hundred dollars how our hearts would sing! More than a year ago I placed my box on my table, with no idea of the result, and opening it just now I find a $5 gold piece among the pennies. I do not know who put it in, I only know I did my part and God did the balance. Why does not every woman keep a mite-box in sight? It is such a simple thing to do and there is omnipotent power engaged to work with us for its filling." Mrs. C. A. Trego, Warrensburg, Mo., sends $13.65. She writes: "$3.65 comes from my mite-box, the balance for a full Baby Band. How I would love to multiply the sum by one hundred!" Mrs. James Cumming, Jersey City, N. J., sends $4 from her box, with these words: "I wish it were as many thousands. I am growing old and feeble, but have done my best, and soon the dear Master will say: 'It is enough.' I can never see our beautiful Temple with earthly eyes." Mrs. H. A. Stone, Lincoln, Neb., forwards $3.65 from her box, and twenty cents to add two more names to the Baby Band for her state. She is seventy years old and feels that this is her last collection for the Temple. The bank in which she had laid up means for her last expenses has failed, but this faithful saint says: "I am not afraid; the Lord will see to that which is needful." She has been the most enthusiastic worker in her union. Mrs. Josephine F. Montgomery, Jacksonville, Ark., also sends $3.65, contents of her mite-box; fifty cents of the sum being sacred to the memory of a son long since in heaven. She says: "May the altar-fires kindled in Willard Hall grow brighter and brighter unto the perfect day." Mrs. Clara La Fou sends $3.65 from the box of Palmyra, Mo., W. C. T. U. She speaks thus: "I would rather see the Temple than the Columbian Exposition, and I would rather see Mrs. Carse than the president of the United States."

A Band of Hope, New Orleans, La., of which Teresa A. Hartman is leader, sends $1.15, a mite-box collection which the children have earned. They are working also for the Children's Fountain and are buying a library. Two L. T. L. members of McDougall's, N. Y., Florence L. and Edith B. Wilcox, send $3.70 from their box; these little girls are only eight and ten years of age. The mite-box of Anita Bailey, a Loyal Temperance Legioner, of Knowlton, P. Q., Can., turns out $3.65 for the Temple. We temperance folks are all for "annexation" of such sterling neighbors as this little Canadian. The Tallahassee, Fla., Loyal Temperance Legion forwards $6 from its mite-box, saying that it is a gift of love. The L. T. L. of Macomb, Kan., sends forty-five cents from its mite-box. The Temperance Builders, a Juvenile society of Washington, R. I., forward $1 for our Temple, and the same amount comes from Co. B, Lathrap Division of L. T. L., of West Salem, Wis.; $2 from L. T. L. of Tiskilwa, Ill., and $4 from Loyal Temperance Legioners of Frankford, Pa. The L. T. L. of Idaho has undertaken to have a tablet, and sends $10 as its first installment on a $100 pledge. They started off on this enterprise with a ten cent tea-party, and cleared more than seventy per cent of total receipts. Heaven bless the dear little midgets, who so early learn to think of others and to work for great causes. A citizenship of such will not only one day find a heavenly country, but will make this old earth a sweeter, safer place to live in—for those who will follow this age of battle for the right.

Middleton, R. I., W. C. T. U. contributes $45.75 to complete its $100 pledge. This tablet is largely the result of Demorest medal contests, by which a great educative work was carried on. Mrs. Lydia B. Chace, of Newport, began this work with mite-box and a Baby Band, while she was a suffering invalid. Mrs. Wm. E. Currah, Temple superintendent for the Frances E. Willard W. C. T. U., of Helena, Mont., sends $15, a second payment on its $100 pledge. The following enticing suggestion comes from this ingenious superintendent—that the W. T. P. A. should put out a fan, with the Temple on it, to be sold for the Temple fund during this Fair year. She further suggests that it might be made to fold into shape like a clothes pin, light, easily carried, and cheaply mailed for use anywhere. Mrs. S. W. Fiske, De Ruyter, N. Y., contributes $15 toward a tablet for her county president, Mrs. E. C. Bushnell. This sum seems to have been collected in mite-boxes of the Cazenovia union.

All checks, post-office orders, etc., should be made in the name of Wm. D. Preston, Metropolitan National Bank, The Temple, Chicago, Ill. Mr. Preston is the newly-elected treasurer of the Board of Temple Trustees. All letters containing funds should be sent to Miss Sara G. Johnson, financial secretary of the Board of Temple Trustees, The Temple, Chicago, Ill., who will deposit the money with the treasurer.

An extension of time, till May 1, has been granted the mite-box holders. All drafts should be made out in the name of Wm. D. Preston. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasuries of the World's and National W. JOY TO THE WORLD.

Throughout the Christian world the Easter season is associated with brightness and gladness, with music and flowers and general rejoicing. All nature throbs with awakening life. The springing grass, the birds, the trees, everything around us and above us, stir with the movings of that vivifying spirit which betokens new birth. The human soul—nature in its highest manifestation—attunes itself to the triumphant charms, and the swelling harmony of the grand diapason "closes full in man."

The subtle influences of the manifold resurrections of spring-time renders the heart peculiarly responsive to the Easter spirit and fits it for the reception of the transcendent truth set forth in the resurrection of our Lord. The event we commemorate at Easter is both a fulfillment and a prophecy; a fulfillment as regards the Christ himself, a prophecy as regards the rest of mankind. The resurrection is no longer regarded, even from the standpoint of science, as a mere religious fable. As science advances and the fact of the continuity of law becomes more and more apparent, the scientist recognizes the operation of natural law—"natural" in the sense of being normal or orderly—in spheres beyond those circumscribed by the human mental horizon. Science, as well as religion, bears witness to the divine paradox-life through death; earth, as well as heaven, proclaims the truth of the resurrection.

Nothing more clearly demonstrates the truth of the gospel as taught by Jesus than the wonderful advance of the human race spiritually and materially under its influence. The manner in which Easter, that most significant of all Christian festivals, is celebrated, is an illustration in point. None who is familiar with the story of our Lord's resurrection as related in the gospels can fail to be impressed with the contrast between the "then" and the "now" of its reception by the world. Then, for fear of the powerful Jews, the few friends and followers of the despised Nazarene took counsel together behind closed doors, and in awe-struck whispers gave secret expression to a joy that was half terror in its wonder and amazement. Now, the event is commemorated by public festival the world over, the religious ceremonies of Easter Sunday being often accompanied with much pomp and ostentation. All round the habitable globe are erected "in His name" churches and chapels where Easter bells ring out in joyous chime, "Christ is risen; He is risen indeed." The ruling nations of the earth are proud to own the sway of the once despised man of Nazareth, while the gospel messengers sent forth in obedience to the command of the risen Lord have carried the holy light into all the dark places of the earth.

To what can this wonderful development Christ-ward be attributed if not to Christ in man? And it is the resurrection which has made possible this union of God and man; which has made it possible for Christ to be in us "the hope of glory."

During the last few centuries the world has been rapidly gaining a truer conception of Christianity. Mediæval history is a dark record of a most unChrist-like churchanity. Certain Easter customs once prevalent in so-called Christian nations serve to illustrate the growth of the gospel idea. The maltreatment of the Jews was, even later than the period known as the "dark ages," considered an expression of true Christian zeal, and in France a prominent feature of Easter celebration was the stoning of these unfortunates. It is related that upon one occasion a high French official ordered a Jew to be flogged that the spectacle might furnish entertainment for a distinguished guest. The order was so zealously obeyed that the victim expired on the spot. In England it was customary for boys to run through the streets on Easter morning crying:

"Christ is risen, Christ is risen,
All the Jews must go to prison."

And to show their hatred of the Jews, the crucifiers of the Saviour, the English made a point of eating bacon upon Easter day. How different from the true Christ spirit which says, "Forgive them, for they know not what they do"! It is a noteworthy fact that those nations which are the most Christian are the most tolerant of all forms of religious belief.

The Easter festival may be truly regarded as the Christian Passover. The blood of Christ, our paschal Lamb, applied to the soul stays the hand of the destroying angel. Death has no terrors for the soul redeemed. The true child of God views the grave from the vantage ground of a conqueror, and, like Sir Gareth, renowned knight of Arthur's hall, discovers in Death a friend with blooming face and form under the guise of a monster—a friend who helps him to "win the quest." Over the Christian's death-bed it may well be written:

"Is this a death-bed where the Christian lies?
Yes; but not his; 'tis Death itself there dies."

The resurrection of Jesus means for the individual and for the world a passing from old conditions to new. It signifies the soul's exodus, the going out from the bondage of the flesh or material limitations into the freedom of spiritual life. The Christian world as yet but dimly perceives the "power of the resurrection"; the power that is the rightful heritage of every child of God by reason of the rising from the dead of Christ our representative. Paul himself, notwithstanding his deep, spiritual insight, did not "attain" unto it. He pressed forward, though, determinedly, toward this highest of all marks, feeling assured that sometime, somewhere, God would "reveal even this" unto him and unto us.

Though we only know in part, we know that the resurrection is the climax of gospel purpose, the keystone of the Christian arch. Take away Easter, and Christmas would have no meaning, no hope for us. Take away the fact of the resurrection and neither the birth nor the death of Jesus would avail, we should "be yet in our sins." The resurrection sets the divine seal upon the man of Nazareth and proclaims Him Christ indeed.

With what peculiar and blessed significance does Eastertide come to woman! To woman the risen Christ first revealed Himself; to woman was given the first command to preach the glad tidings of a risen Saviour. The Marys it was who carried the wonderful news to the sorrowful eleven. "Go, tell my brethren." How full of glorious suggestion are these words to all Christ's followers! Still His brethren, though He had entered upon another and more glorious life! Death and the grave were powerless to sunder the old sweet relationship; it was to stand for all time "even to the end of the world."

And the "go, tell" of Jesus has been echoing and re-echoing in woman's ears all down the ages; she has heard and obeyed, and to-day, with greater power than ever, do we find Christian womanhood proclaiming to the church and to the world a living Christ and a living, practical Christianity.

The resurrection ushered in the age of woman. Ever since that event she has been slowly but surely regaining her rightful place in creation. A living Christ means a redeemed humanity, a lifting of the Edenic curse, and who shall prophesy what that means for woman?

Birth—Death—Resurrection—such is the order of experience of every individual soul traveling God-ward.

EASTER SUNDAY.

For many of our readers, especially our young readers, Easter Sunday is the very brightest Sunday of all the year. To those who have not yet awakened to the higher significance of the day, it is still the Sunday when every altar is piled high with flowers and when every church echoes with the sweetest songs. Blossoms and music are everywhere. In many countries, and in many places in our own country, the Easter is the time for clothing one's self in new garments. The Bible speaks of putting on "the garment of praise" in the place of "the spirit of heaviness," and there is something symbolic in the idea of clothing the body in new and beautiful raiment at this time when all the world seems fresh and new.

To multitudes of our readers the coming Easter will have in it these three things—flowers, music and the new and beautiful raiment, and small as these things seem when compared with the inward beauty and the inward rejoicing, and the being "clothed upon" with new life, yet these outward things alone are enough to make the, Easter Sunday dear. Let us rejoice for the multitudes who get out of the day even the joy of these three things, but let us be a thousand times more grateful that our own eyes have been opened and our own hearts uplifted to see the true meaning of the Easter beauty and to echo the Easter songs of praise.

For those of us who are so blessed as to know the true Easter joy, the Easter Sunday will bring more than a promenade on the avenues, an admiration of the floral decorations in the various churches and a selection of the place where the sweetest anthems can be heard.

If we are so made that our hearts answer to the voices that are murmuring in the tree-tops and in the wind, we shall be watching for the signs in these outward things of the new waking to life in nature, which the Easter symbolized to the ancients in the days before Christianity had begun to appropriate from Paganism the symbolism of an earlier faith.

The true lover of nature cannot fail to be impressed by this harmony between the waking to life of the outward world and the coming forth of spring from the grave of winter, and the immortal life triumphing over the sting of death and the victory of the grave. Human hearts are so made that we scarce need that Christ should have risen from the dead in order to give us our own hope of immortality; yet the thought that He has risen makes of our hope a conviction, and of its fulfillment a certainty. Since He lives we shall live also; and when we consider that that means that all that ever made life blessed to us and worth having to us, is surely waiting for us further on, it gives reason enough for Easter joy.

But in addition to this, we who love the Sabbath and give its sacred thinking to the real things of life, and who love the Easter Sabbath most of all, find a still more solemn significance and a deeper joy in the fact that Christ has risen. The Christ to-day is to us the embodiment of all that we most love, of all that we would like to become, of all that is noblest and holiest, the truest we can be, the bravest we can do. The Christ in us means life stirring in all our best aspirations, all our highest purposes, all our deepest sacrifices, all our holiest joys. We go on sometimes even through years without there being under the surface of our hearts—often as cold and hard as the crust of earth in winter—any throbbing life of God or any quickening of that which is gentlest and truest and best. By and by God sends us an Easter—sends it, perhaps, at the very Easter time, when the whole world remembers that Christ is risen from the grave—and we know by the change in ourselves that He is risen, not only for us but in us. We know that all the good things, like the grass and flowers of spring, are starting into life. We feel the impulse Godward, the desire to be better than we are, and to do better than we have ever done. Christ not only seems alive, but He seems living. We see Him in the hearts of the people all around us. He shines through their faces when they smile on us in kindness. We hear Him in their voices when they raise them in prayer or praise. We hear Him in all the pulsing music that throbs through the great churches. We hear Him in the carols of the little children. We feel Him everywhere in the hope and stir, that is like a "going in the trees," and life seems to pervade everything. The soul no longer cares to sleep. It cannot be slothful any more. A new life has come into it. It has practically been brought from the grave, where all its best was sleeping, and is alive in Christ.

In much of our daily association with other human beings the face wears unconsciously a mask. It is like the cold and hard surface of the earth after the winter frosts have chilled it. The earth gives no sign of what is buried beneath. Often the human face, and the voice and the manner give no sign. It would seem as if all the beautiful things that blossomed on the earth were buried under the snow. It would seem as if all the up-reaching aspirations, all the love to God, all the love to men, all the nobler impulses and best purposes were hidden under the wintry aspect that our souls wear most of the time. But at Easter tide the flowers begin to spring through the frost-bound earth. At Easter tide, too, whatever there is of love, of gentleness, of human kindness, of unity, of fellowship, of desire to uplift the lowly, to succor the suffering, awakes again in the heart, and awakes because the Christ Himself is alive, and is beginning to live in us.

With such a view as this, with what wonderful significance echo the words, "Christ is our life." "In Him is life, and the life is the light of men. In Him ye not only have life, but ye have it more abundantly." At this Easter time those who have not yet known the life in Him, and so have known no true living, may awake to the consciousness that ours is not a dead and buried Lord; and those who have in some measure apprehended what a Christ-life in the hearts of men may mean, may enter into the "more abundant life" this glorious Easter morn

ONE OF CHICAGO'S PHILANTHROPIES.

A word about the Children's Aid Society cannot fail to interest our readers in one of the tenderest and divinest charities carried on in the name of Him who took little children in His arms and blessed them. It was chartered in 1890, having the avowed purpose "to improve the condition of poor and destitute children," and to overcome with its own good the ghastly evil of "baby farming"—a death-yielding industry extensively carried on in some quarters of this and every city. Its primogenitor was the late Rev. Glen Wood, whose monument it will be—more enduring than "storied urn or animated bust." Mrs. Wood was associated with her husband in all his work.

Soon the great-hearted pair began to see that often the mother stood as much in need of their beneficent aid as did the child. They began the attempt to place mother and child in the same home, the woman to receive moderate wages for her service. The success of the undertaking was remarkable. In fifteen months the society had found homes for three hundred and fifty-eight children, and in two hundred and twenty-six cases the mother and babe were placed together. The advantages of this plan are twofold. A much larger proportion of children are saved than when reared by artificial nursing.

The other advantage is the salvation of the unfortunate mothers. There are some deserted wives and some widowed in an untimely hour, but the majority of those seeking aid are deceived and deserted girls. Such an one disgraced is disheartened. Separated from the little one which has cost her so dear, and her love quenched, good dies in her and she lends herself easily to temptation from without and within. Often she meets the snare before she leaves the hospital ward. We would cast no slur upon hospital management. The soberly clad, perhaps crape-veiled procuress enters, unobserved, side by side with the city missionary on "visiting day," and it has happened that our missionaries have overheard the conversation in which the young mother is "engaged" for a "situation" at light work and large pay, as soon as she is able to come out and dispose of her babe.

The extreme youth of many of these mothers challenges the pity of womanly hearts, and the protection of Christian homes. It seems incredible, but is a fact, that recently one of the visitors of the Children's Aid Society, found in the Maternity Cottage, at Dunning, a girl of thirteen, mother of twin babies, while the Presbyterian hospital had a sixteen-year-old mother.

If the coming Exposition is like previous ones, there will be a goodly number of babes abandoned on the grounds by faithless mothers. They will be turned over to the Children's Aid Society, and will probably fare better than any preceding set of Fair foundlings. We are sure this society will not ask in vain for the sympathy and coöperation of Christian and philanthropic women. The homes of widows, elderly couples and childless homes should everywhere be open to them, and the blessings of them that are ready to perish will follow.

In the name of the most helpless layer of humanity we tug at the latch-strings of W. C. T. U. homes. One child reared in love and righteousness may count for more on life's balance sheet than many speeches made or meetings held. Surely there can be no higher, tenderer object than the "preservation of mother and child, the mother from further degradation, and the child from an early grave, or from evil association, the restoration of the one, and the education of the other to fellowship in the ranks of Christian civilization."

The Chicago Herald, in its wrath at the failure of the attempt to open the World's Fair on Sunday, relieves itself as angry children do by calling names and making faces. It says that the result was brought about by "a miserable fraction of the American people, composed in part of rich frauds, in part of honest fanatics, in part of narrow-minded women belonging to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and in part of detested politicians of the Quay type." It adds: "The saddest element in this discreditable decision is that women have been so vicious to their own sex. Idle and unreflecting women have been potent in doing a grievous injury to hundreds of thousands of working, thoughtful and virtuous women." Commenting upon this, the New York Advocate says, "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been subject to considerable criticism for allying itself with a political party and becoming a propagandist of woman suffrage; but this is the first time that we have heard its members called idle and unreflecting women. They are all as far removed from idle as it is possible for human beings to be; and so far from being unreflecting, they give as much thought to their work, and understand as well what they are doing, and do as much work as any association, male or female, in the world." We certainly appreciate these words from a paper which we have had little reason to count among our friends, but there are some lessons which all similar opposers of the W. C. T. U. may learn if they will, from this editorial of the Herald and one is that the term Christian in our name stands for a fact. At the first convention in Cleveland, there were those who favored as a matter of expediency the leaving out of that word, but the great majority believed that to leave it out would be to deny their Master. From that day to this the W. C. T. U. has conformed its policy to what it believed to be right, not to do what it thought might be "expedient." Nothing could better disclose the real Christian character of the W. C. T. U. than these bitter words of an unchristian newspaper, and it might be well for the few Christian ministers and editors who antagonize this army of women, to inquire somewhat carefully if they are not firing into the ranks of their friends instead of into those of the enemy. That the W. C. T. U. is thoroughly Christian, only those utterly blinded by prejudice can deny; that the great majority of its members are also woman suffragists no one can deny. Is it not just possible that this army of women may be as safely trusted on the subject of woman suffrage as the liquor army which is openly and avowedly the most bitter enemy of woman suffrage that exists? At all events, would it not be both wiser and more Christian to agree to disagree with these women amicably on this subject and not denounce them with wholesale accusations?

If ever faith and works went hand-in-hand, it was in the days of the Crusade. Some of our sisters who hold their prayer-meeting and then go home, need to be reminded that straight from theirs, the praying-bands of the Crusade marched out into the highways and hedges of sin, and with loving compulsion invited wanderers to the gospel feast. We must measure up more nearly to the Saviour's standard of "going about doing good." Imagine that the hours between Sabbath-school and tea time should be employed by all members of the church in going out, two by two, with earnest invitations into the homes of the non-church-going class, and into the saloons and other haunts of sin, would there be a vacant seat in the Lord's house at evening? Not one. This we firmly believe, because our temperance work has taught us a most hopeful definition of the genus homo. Plato said man is a biped without feathers; Hugo calls him the only animal who laughs; but we believe a truer definition is this: Man is the most persuadable of all created beings; with his heart full of aches and his eyes full of tears, he can be won by kindness. Knowing then the terrors of God's broken law and the tenderness of Christ we persuade men. We are going out after the ungospeled masses as never before since the Crusade. Theatre meetings are multiplying; depot meetings and open air gatherings are more frequent; temperance tabernacles are attracting interested attention; visitation of prisons and charitable institutions increases; meetings for sailors are kept up, and the question presses upon us, How shall our women be trained so that they may rightly divide the word of God to these hungry multitudes who come to hear?

John Burns, of England, is described as the Garibaldi of the workingmen's movement, and Tom Mann as its Cavour; one is the inspirer and orator, the other the organizer and statesman. Ben Tillett is an orator and a strong poetic nature. He is a member "in good and regular standing" of the Congregational church. Tom Mann both prays and preaches on occasion, but unhappily John Burns, having lived much on the continent, has come under influences that have made him materialistic in ideas. Leaders in English politics predict that he is almost certain to become a Cabinet minister in ten years. The forecasts in London just now are to the effect that the Gladstone government is not unlikely to go out of power next summer, and the Conservatives to come in; after which within a few years the workingmen's party is sure to come to the top with its ideas of Christian socialism. Fortunately it is the ballot and not the bullet that the English working people rely upon as their source of power and the way out of the wilderness.

The Yankee nation is proverbial for its skill in business advertisement, but the English excel all other nations in their ingenuity as advertisers of charitable enterprises. For instance take the following from the London papers It is signed by Benjamin Waugh, perhaps the nearest friend of the editor of the Review of Reviews, and the author of that "Life of William T. Stead" issued from our W. T. P. A. press at the time of the Pall Mall Gazette disclosures. Benjamin Waugh is also editor of the Sunday Magazine and the chief officer of the national society for the prevention of cruelty to children. This is his advertisement: "The sole object of our society is to secure to every little English child that its life shall be at least endurable. We have stopped or ameliorated the endless pains and tortures of more than 60,000 children. Unhappily, however, we have no less a debt than twenty-five thousand dollars. It is believed that this has only to be known to secure its speedy removal." Here follows the address, 7 Harper street, Bloomsbury, London, W. C.

It is easier to prevent than to undo.

Strange, isn't it, that so many wise law-makers in our state legislatures are ready to make laws for women's benefit (?) as evidenced by the recent anti-crinoline legislation. One racy speaker in commenting thereon in a recent lecture, remarked: "It takes so much more courage to present a bill against the wearing of crinoline than it does to present one against the hoop around a whisky barrel!"

True consideration for others, the ready wit and tactful acceptance of circumstances which should be qualities of all who attempt public speaking, was well shown by the Englishman, a temperance lecturer, who was invited to speak on total abstinence at a public gathering. He was placed last on the long list of speakers, and the chairman also introduced several speakers whose names were not on the list. The audience consequently were tired out when the chair announced, "Mr. Bailey will now give us his address," "My address," said Mr. Bailey, rising, "is 45 Loughborough Park, Brixton Road, and I wish you all good-night."

The collection was being taken in a colored church. While it was in progress a song with the words was sung: "Fly over all the world, thou everlasting gospel.' When the results of the collection were brought to the pulpit, as is the custom in that church, the minister, looking down disgustedly into the hats, said: "Talk of wings to fly with the everlasting gospel when you ain't even put in enough to buy it pin feathers." I asked the colored brother—you know they have the largest collections of anybody—what is the best way to take them and he said, "Ma'am, you can call it what you like, but it is all reduced down to this, take your hat and go out among the congregation."

Intelligent and consecrated workers are needed in every cause, and never did a work fail which was conducted by such. "If we attempt nothing we can accomplish nothing," said an earnest worker recently in writing Mrs. Carse concerning the efforts of the local union for "Our House Beautiful," which she is resolved shall send its one hundred dollar pledge before April. With such deep interest and determination it will be done. A circular issued by the eleventh district, Iowa, W. C. T. U., is worthy repetition everywhere. They believe one of the very best uses to which their money can be put, this year, is to invest it in the Temperance Temple. "The sooner it is paid for the sooner we will get an annual income for state work," say they. With such applied determination on the part of all our workers, the Temple would soon be ours and realize our fullest expectations.

Within the memory of many of us, the advocates of the theory that God ought to have made woman essentially different from man and therefore that He did, asserted that while woman could make a fair success in literary work she was incapable of anything but the simplest mathematical attainments. The bright girls of the nineteenth century have so completely annihilated this supposition that it is superfluous to attempt any proof of the opposite. It is a matter of interest, however, to note the women who, though such work is not yet as free to women as to men, make exceptional success in mathematical work. One of these women is Mrs. E. P. Brown Davis, who ranks as one of the leading mathematicians of this country. She was educated in the public schools of Washington, D. C. Afterwards she taught there and at the same time attended the night school of the scientific department of Columbian University from which she graduated. Her teacher, Prof. Gore, recognizing her ability, employed her to read the proof-sheets of his work on geodesy. This secured her employment by Prof. Simon Newcombe, whom she assisted in his work in calculus. She read the proofs and verified his calculations. At this time a vacancy occurred in the position of computer for the Nautical Almanac. With twelve young men, Miss Brown took the competitive examination. Her paper was marked one hundred plus, and she secured the position with a salary of twelve hundred dollars. Before her graduation she had discovered and corrected an error in La Place's tables that for years had produced inconsistencies which had puzzled astronomers. When Miss Brown became Mrs. Davis, she resigned her position on the Nautical Almanac but she still continues her mathematical and astronomical work.

EASTER THOUGHTS.

Easter brings to earth reminders of the sweetest hope ever given to humanity—the hope of an everlasting life of perfect happiness. And yet it is not the happiness promised, not the freedom from pain, the exemption faom sorrow, the escape from punishment, that pleases us most in our anticipations of the future, but the new life itself.

Sin has made us weary. We are tired of it. We are tired of the chains of sinful habits that have bound, and are binding us, and tired of the eternal vigilance necessary to keep ourselves from falling into new habits of wrong which would prove as hard to break from as the old ones. To be changed—to rise from the grave with the upward tendency of our lives eternally fixed, so that we need do nothing but grow sweet and beautiful, that is the glorious truth that is contained in that one word—resurrection. No wonder that Easter is full of brightness to the Christian.

Easter reminds us each year of the assurance of our hope. Our hope of a future life is founded on two things, the immutable word of God, and the great historical fact that Jesus Christ, a man on earth, having a body like ours, dependent on material food for its sustenance, arose from the dead and was seen, not by one or two, but by over five hundred witnesses. No fact in history has more complete proof.

And this Christ, who, Himself, arose from the dead and ascended into heaven, promised eternal life to those who believe on His name and follow Him. Can we doubt that He has both the power and the willingness to grant us the great gift He has promised? Sooner would I think of doubting the word of the dearest friend I have on earth than the word of this more than earthly friend—the Saviour of Mankind.

Easter is a good time to begin a new life. It is the time for the Christian to lay aside his besetting sin and spring up into the glad air of a higher spiritual life. It is time for the sinner to leave off sinning, and, looking up to the loving face of the risen Jesus, take the step that shall leave him forever free from the old life of sin and shame with its worry and care and burden. Oh, isn't it grand that the Lord gives us the days of sweet beginnings all along in our life?

The pure, white lily, the gorgeous butterfly coming from his chrysalis, and the innocent chicken peeping from the egg shell, are the symbols of Easter. They each represent the beginning of a higher form of life than the caterpillar, the lily bud or the hen's egg represented. But as the crawling caterpillar contained the soaring butterfly, the bud contained the lily, and the egg contained the chicken in embryo, so do you, dear, vanquished, discouraged soul, contain the possibility of a high and noble spiritual life within you. Why not begin this beautiful Easter day to live it?

No one can look on the symbols of Easter without a sense of joy. Wherever you see the beautiful butterfly, the sweet lily, the downy chicken, you love them and are touched with gladness. Why should not these voices of nature win you to begin the higher, better, sweeter life to-day?

Easter is a day of triumph. In the resurrection Jesus Christ overcame death and the grave for all the world, and made it possible for those who follow Him to do likewise. Ever since He arose from the dead Christians have been enabled to face death with smiles, to sing songs in the midst of the darkest peril, to give up all they held dear in this life for the sake of the hope of the life beyond the grave through Christ, and count it not loss but gain. Faith in the resurrection gives us perfect assurance of the hope of eternal life. This is the victory that overcometh the world.

Easter is a time to help others. Ah, so many are struggling in the bondage of sin. So many are bewildered because they do not know the way out. They are unhappy, but they do not realize that sin has made them so. They do not dream that a glorious new life is possible to them on this earth and a beautiful resurrection in store for them after death. Who will go and tell them?

Go, dear heart, if the Easter brings joy and happiness to you, go and help some one else to be happy. Take a bunch of Easter flowers to the sick one, a word of encouragement to the struggling one, a paper butterfly or a tiny painted egg to the poor child who cannot buy such things, or read a story to the blind one. Do some little thing to make some one's life a little brighter and your Easter will seem all the more glad in consequence.

OUR THIRD AND FOURTH ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARIES IN NEW ZEALAND AND TASMANIA.

We sailed from Sydney, October 20, for Auckland, New Zealand, and after a stormy passage of six days, rejoiced to see its very beautiful harbor, and received hearty welcome from Mrs. Schnackenberg, the colonial W. C. T. U. president, and the Rev. Joseph Berry, a declared supporter of our organization and of woman's suffrage. Strong sentiment in favor of the last named prevails throughout New Zealand; and women have almost reached the goal on several occasions—especially at the last session of Parliament, it being at one time authoritatively stated that the bill had passed—but they have proved for themselves the truth that one voter's influence outweighs thousands of non-voter's demands. As one of the disfranchised remarked, "The women in their hard toil have been like so many chess-pieces to be swept off the board by the political player at any moment that the whim seized him." The suffrage is certain to be gained, however, at no distant day, and what a glorious heritage will be that of the New Zealand women! for their country, in natural conformation, products, climate, and all that delights the taste, or satisfies mental and material needs, is truly an "earthly paradise." The morning after our arrival we accompanied our host and hostess, Mr. and Mrs. Berry, to the top of Mount Eden, overlooking a panorama sixty miles in extent, of wonder and beauty such as I doubt if any other point of vision can reproduce. The old hymn kept singing itself through my brain:

"Lo! On a narrow neck of land, for the isthmus on which we stood was only eight miles across, and on the north, east and west the sea stretched away illimitably, while an extinct volcano frowned in a southerly direction, and Auckland lay smiling in the midst of rose-gardens and luxuriant greenery, at our feet, as if no angry convulsions of nature had ever disturbed this peaceful scene. We had the honor of paying our respects to Sir William Fox, the veteran temperance leader of all Australia, at his own home, and grieved to see his physical strength so shattered. He spoke with ardent zeal of the cause so dear to him and to us, and gave us a patriarchal benediction at parting.
'Twixt two unbounded seas I stand!"

We had two large meetings in Auckland, one in Mr. Berry's church, Wesleyan, and the second in the Baptist Tabernacle, built by the Rev. Thos. Spurgeon, son of the great preacher whose loss the world mourns—and built after the same style as that of the Metropolitan Tabernacle in London, a delightful place to speak in, especially with so finely responsive an audience. Here we took our first real outing since we left home, visiting the celebrated "Hot Lake District" in company with Mrs. Schnackenberg, who, though a resident of the colony for over thirty years had never seen the wonders of this region. The journey meant a day's travel by railway, and little more than a half day by coach, passing the last few hours through the most magnificent bush scenery that the imagination can picture; a wild and lavish luxuriance of giant tree-ferns, grand forest trees, graceful white creepers and myriad growths, weird and fascinating to our eager eyes; towering heights and somber depths challenged our vision; now and then the notes of a strange bird thrilled out of the impenetrable recesses, or the flash of one of these feathered songsters shot a streak of vivid color athwart the sky. All this was fitting prelude to the mysterious region into which we were about to enter. "Wonderland," indeed, with its boiling geysers of water and of mud, the latter sometimes black as a Stygian pool, and again of white earth, transformed as it bubbled and rose, into countless fantastic shapes, flowers, tools, dishes, and conventional patterns; with its deep, blue pools, its healing springs, its clouds of steam arising in every direction from lakes and fissures, and even amid the current of its rushing streams.

There are great boiling pools, with white, smooth stones at the edge, where the Maoris cook their food without labor or price. We watched them draw out from the water the rude bags containing their pork and potatoes and carry them off to their huts at dinner time, and afterward visited a native house, where we saw the inmates squatting on the ground and eating with their fingers. At a place near one of these boiling pools we found a close, wooden enclosure, placed about a fissure in the rocks, and here certain of the villagers, who preferred the same simple diet steamed instead of boiled, had placed their food, and had thrown an old coffee-sack over the top to shut in the steam; a careless, primitive life they lead. A volcanic eruption occurred here only six years ago, and we listened to the thrilling story sitting beside the "brain-pot"—in which the Maori tribes were wont to cook the heads of their enemies in early days, as a cannibal feast—under the purple shadows of the mountains at the sunset hour, as told us, in fairly good English, by "Sophia," the head woman of her tribe. It must have been a strange and awful time, when the frightened natives huddled together for thirty-six hours in the thick darkness, broken only by the falling of lurid fire-balls through the pall of ashes and lava that overspread the sky. It was at this time that the beautiful pink and white terraces, which Mrs. Leavitt had the delight of seeing a short time previous, were destroyed. The earth's surface is a mere shell here, and it is not safe to go anywhere without a guide; as we tapped our umbrellas on the ground a hollow echo responded.

When the great geyser, "Pohuto," is in full action it is a marvelous sight, throwing its boiling waters forty and sometimes sixty feet high, falling into showers of diamonds under the glorifying touch of the sunshine. Sitting near by it, on a pile of rocks, I talked to Sophia of temperance. Poor, untutored Maori woman, with such heroic and generous qualities, as shown by her conduct toward her people at the time of the eruption, with almost unlimited influence over them, yet a slave to the drink! She told us that it all began in the urgency of tourists who often begged her to "take something" after the hardships of her services for them as guide; she told us also of the interest taken in her by some kind American friends a few years ago, who came there for pleasure, but were about the Master's business as well, and persuaded her to sign the pledge, which she kept for nearly a year, but could no longer resist constant temptation. We told her of the One "able to save to the uttermost," and often pray that she may know the fullness of His power. It was delightful to hear Mrs. Schnackenberg talk to the Maoris in their own tongue. She was a missionary among them for many years.

We visited six of the principal places of New Zealand, Auckland, Napier, Wellington, Christchurch, Dunedin and Invercargill. With scarcely an exception we had grand meetings all the way through the colony, crowded and enthusiastic. The short coasted voyages were very rough and exhausted much of our strength, but the kindness of the friends was abounding, and we were shielded to the utmost from unnecessary demands on our slender remnant of physical endurance, and completed our plan of visitation, without a single break, throughout Tasmania and the two islands of New Zealand, although this included five sea voyages, with all the uncertainty that attends this mode of travel, and our engagements were necessarily crowded up as closely as possible, because of the limited time at our disposal.

Of course our opportunities were not as good for seeing the full scope of W. C. T. U. work in this colony as in Queensland, because of visiting a smaller number of unions, and also not having the privilege of meeting the white-ribboners in annual convention; but our acquaintance with them gives us large assurance not only for the present but for the future of our beloved organization in New Zealand. At Christchurch we met the Rev. Mr. Isitt, the leader of prohibition sentiment in the colony, and editor of The Prohibitionist. He is going to Chicago in time to attend the World's W. C. T. U. Convention and other temperance assemblies during the World's Fair, and expects to look thoroughly into the workings of legal prohibition while in our country, that he may be more completely armed with arguments against the enemies of such legislation. He is an able, zealous man. New Zealand is undoubtedly much farther advanced in prohibition sentiment than any other colony visited, and great honor must be given to Mr. Isitt's fearless utterances in his paper, which has a very large circulation.

The W. C. T. U. has a page in The Prohibitionist regularly, edited with much talent by Mrs. Sheppard, who is also Colonial superintendent of franchise and petition work. I have already referred to the forward state of woman's franchise in the colony. The petition for this measure presented to the last parliament, bore over ten thousand signatures.

Sixteen unions and eight Y's were reported at the annual convention last March. Twenty departments of work are taken up. Through the efforts of the W. C. T. U., scientific temperance instruction is given in some of the public schools, but the law for this is permissive, not obligatory, and therefore unsatisfactory. Temperance booths are carried on, in connection with the agricultural shows every year, by certain unions very successfully, notably by the Christchurch ladies, whose receipts last year were nearly a thousand dollars, which sum was expended in the furtherance of W. C. T. U. activities. The same work was undertaken by the Dunedin union, and much good to the public in general was the result; here our workers maintain a Sailors' Rest, greatly needed places in these seaport towns, and there has been blessed outcome; evangelistic services are also held in different parts of the town. The Napier union distributed last year one thousand copies of The Prohibitionist fortnightly, and the Wellington ladies three thousand copies in the same manner. At Invercargill our workers have made a special effort to have temperance items inserted in the weekly papers, paying for the privilege. The C. D. Acts are on the statute books of New Zealand, but are not believed to be in active operation. A few years ago an effort was made in Auckland to enforce them, but through the prompt opposition of the W. C. T. U., this movement was defeated. We found the sentiment in favor of social purity strong and outspoken throughout the colony. Much relief, hospital, pledge and refuge work, distribution of literature, boxes at railway stations, coffee-rooms, and other lines of activity, have been carried on with wise zeal by our faithful sisters. We cannot speak too appreciatively of the generous reception and financial help given us as World's W. C. T. U. missionaries, and pray God to bless them an hundredfold for their large and loving ministry toward us in our necessities.

Five days more of tossing on the deep, and we approached the city of Hobart, Tasmania, "beautiful for situation," the shores of its harbor broken into such lovely curves, and the water studded with charming emerald islands, while back of the city stands a grand old sentry mountain. Here we were most kindly welcomed by Mrs. McLean, a dear friend from Brisbane, Queensland, and Mrs. Ward, our hostess. We had an enthusiastic meeting the same evening, and crossed the island to Launceston the next day by train, passing through interesting and beautiful country, and receiving cordial greetings at the station from Mrs. Soltan, Colonial president, and our hostess, Mrs. Hart. Two meetings were held here, and this completed our work in Tasmania, for we were compelled, in order to catch the steamer at Melbourne for our long voyage to Colombo and onwards, to leave Launceston on the third day after our arrival. Eighteen unions have been formed, and Mrs. Soltan has recently visited nearly all of these, and reports good work being done in well-nigh twenty departments. The C. D. Acts are in operation in the principal cities of this beautiful island, in a modified form. We were treated with great courtesy and fairness by the press and public, however, and have reason to hope that there is a growing sentiment in favor of the abrogation of this infamous law.

We are now on the Red Sea, approaching the spot where it is believed that the Israelites crossed over on dry land. Our God is with us, "our Father and our Friend." May we be more obedient and victorious in faith than were His chosen people! Solemn lessons are borne in upon us as we travel by these ages-old pathways, and remember the history of those who went before us, some to failure and others to heavenly conquest.

Greetings for the New Year to all readers of THE UNION SIGNAL!

ELIZABETH W. ANDREW.

News from the Field.

NEW JERSEY.

"HEARTS BOWED DOWN."

Never before have I been ashamed to say to the world at large that New Jersey is my native state—although many times not in accord with its doings—but the acts of our honorable (?) legislature have been of such a disgraceful nature, no decent citizen can help but blush at its proceedings. The race track legislation was not partisan, in the strict sense of the term, but the Democratic party is held responsible because of their large majority in both houses.

The bills were introduced by a Republican, indeed he was sent for that purpose, and from first to last, a few Republicans voted for the bills, as well as a number of Democrats voted against them, and must not be classed with their party's infamy. Introduced and passed in both houses, vetoed by the governor, and passed over his veto in six days, was a piece of fast railroading in legislation never before recorded.

The fact that the governor could have withheld his veto until the following week, and thereby allowed the moral forces time to labor with their constituents, forces us to conclude that if "opposed on constitutional grounds," if no other, he is a very weak man. With a speaker in the house, who is a starter at the "Duke of Gloucester's" race course, and the "Duke" himself a leader of the forces, every resolution to hear the people was promptly tabled; and over and over the most outrageous decisions were given by the speaker to carry the bills.

Repealers were introduced, only to be committed to the care of the same committee who reported favorably the "Racers"—where they still slumber. Then came the seeming to hear the "committee of fifty" by the "coöperation committee," because the outraged people would be heard, followed by the other side, who spoke against time, adjourned to have time given them another day, and all the while the house and senate were passing bills pell-mell, in order to adjourn sine die, which they did. They did not dare to trust the body another Sabbath at their homes; they were elected for a purpose, and faithfully carried it out. The good people didn't wake up until too late, and in consequence must submit to the odium until another year is past.

For once the press seemed to have no power to stop the onward rush of evil, but even when they saw they could not prevent the disgrace of such laws upon our statute books, party lines were laid aside, and they kept up the bombardment. The Citizens' League of the state came down in vast numbers, and some of the most representative men made ringing speeches, and "redress was demanded at the ballot box next fall," for which we are profoundly thankful, and hope their eyes will be kept open in future along that line. One of our editors demanded that the women be allowed the ballot, frankly admitting "that the evil in politics could never be gotten rid of without them." From the complexion of this editor, politically, he, no doubt, means, on Republican lines, they (the women) must vote to purge the nation!

The Methodist conference, on its first day, introduced a resolution, branding the legislators who voted for these vicious laws with infamy and pledging themselves to vote for no candidate in next election who is not openly and expressly pledged to vote for their repeal, also to endeavor to defeat all candidates who are not openly pledged to oppose their repeal.

The State Citizens' League is being thoroughly organized in every county for aggressive work, and we are hopeful that the day of inaction is past—but to accomplish the end desired, all the voters, moral and Christian, whether they be Republicans, Democrats or Prohibitionists, must unite, for it is no baby which confronts us but a giant, who hesitates at nothing to gain his purposes—and while blind eyes are being opened to the evils of racing and gambling, we do pray that voters may see that the same line of action is necessary to render the sale of liquor unlawful. What the women have long known, the men are just beginning to see, that it is not by mass-meetings, resolutions, repealers, etc., when legislators meet, that are most effective, but bullets made of ballots, when legislatures are made up.

Well, the farce is over! The "Duke of Gloucester," who was under indictment for keeping a disorderly house, and whose case was deferred from time to time, has, by the passage of these iniquitous laws, escaped trial, and received sentence at the minimum price, fifty dollars and costs, total sum, ninety-seven dollars. Now let the curtain drop! For a time at least vice, immorality and crime will hold high carnival, for the state seems to be in league with his Satanic majesty.

From all this sickening legislation, we turn to the women, and to our God "who is able to deliver," for I firmly believe that in our affairs, whether for the state or individual communities, God expects every one to do his duty, as if He were not, and when we've done all and can only stand, "He will deliver!" if I did not, I could not lift my eyes nor use my pen longer in the interest of reform—and our women are a unit with me in this thought. While all this evil has been enacted in our midst, for which our women are not responsible, meetings have been held and agitation and education of our future citizens have occupied much time and thought.

Mrs. Clara Hoffman spent a month in the state lecturing to the delight and profit of all who heard her. Mrs. Marion Baxter filled her engagements most acceptably in Burlington county, as well as elsewhere.

Mrs. Ellis spent a week of work in Trenton, under the auspices of the first union, and already the seed is coming into fruitage. Miss Greenwood spent Saturday and Sunday with the same union and drew large audiences. Her Sunday text was, "Why should the church assist in temperance work?" Her arguments were strong; "the church has the numbers; if every one of the 103,000 preachers should preach at least four sermons a year on temperance to the 25,000,000 who attend church, the effect would be marvelous,—and why is it not done? Because the church is not aware of her ability nor responsibility."

As an illustration, she said: "There are 30,000 young men in Washington, D. C., and recently a committee of ten were sent, one each to ten leading prayer-meetings, as many to ten saloons, and to the two lowest theatres. What result? 160 young men at the prayer-meetings, 360 at the saloons, 1,813 at the low theaters, besides 150 small boys." When such a state exists in society isn't it time for the church to combat all forms of sin, that the nation may not be destroyed? For Republics do not die for lack of material resources, but from moral impurities in the individuals who make up the nation. A rescue mission is successfully carried on by a reformed man, and Trenton union No. 2 gives financial aid, as well as some business men of the city. No. 3 has had a most encouraging parlor meeting conducted by the associate National superintendent, Mrs. M. D. Tomlinson.

No. 4, the colored union, is bravely trying to keep up, and one dear woman, who is the controlling spirit in their organization, has almost lost heart, the burden of working almost alone being too much. Many are scarcely able to pay their dues. The person of color, as well as of foreign birth, is a factor in our body politic we cannot afford to ignore; it is a problem which faces us at every turn, and if these people are not educated along the lines of temperance and Christianity dire results must follow. The colored child, as well as the foreign, will help control our future, therefore no union should die for want of aid in ways most needed.

Under the fostering care of Miss Eliza Corson, of Trenton, its messenger boys are not forgotten, and when the day of rewards come for this faithful one, many stars will adorn her crown for her thoughtfulness of these boys, who are constantly in the midst of temptation.

The Young Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of the state have just concluded a most profitable conference in Hackettstown, under the leadership of Miss Mary Campbell, state superintendent. Papers on many lines were prepared, and showed marked ability. Some of the subjects were: "Physical culture," "Diligence in business," "Prayer and Bible study," "Why there should be a Y. W. C. T. U. when there is a society for Christian Endeavor, Epworth League and Y. M. C. A." The pastors of the churches, as well as Dr. Whitney, president of the Institute, attended the sessions, and gave words of hearty indorsement and cheer.

In my next I hope to foreshadow the dawning of a better day; for this we hope, work and pray.

MARCH MENTIONS.

"Who saddens at the thought of idleness cannot be idle,
And he's awake who thinks himself asleep."

"It is so hard to be sick when so much in my department needs to be done!" The dear sister who said this, from Crusade days to the present, has wrought most valiantly for the cause we love, much of the time in foremost ranks on the open field. I wish all our shut-in comrades could realize that no "work" is so acceptable to the Master as heart service, without which all our "doing" is nothing. One whose soul is full of loving sympathy, faith and prayer is a worker in the truest sense, irrespective of environments.

Ohio unions are arranging for Sabbath observance week, April 2–9. We hope every minister in the state will be asked to preach on this subject. Excellent literature treating many important phases of the work can be obtained at trifling cost, from Mrs. E. J. Gray, Medina, O.

Among reports received too late for my last letter, was the Cuyahago county quarterly convention, an occasion of interest and helpfulness to all present. The parliamentary drills by Mrs. Lillian C. Bethel, Columbus, were very instructive. Mrs. Bethel seems to have met the great need of our organizations in the happiest manner possible by her "Compendium and Question Book of Parliamentary Laws," the second edition of which is already out. In the last issue of the Ohio W. C. T. U. Messenger I noticed this question: "How can unions become familiar with parliamentary usages?" The above-mentioned little manual—which costs but twenty-five cents—will make a good parliamentarian of anybody who will study it.

Medina county W. C. T. U. held one of its best conventions at York, February 8. "Exercise and the Muscular System," "Social Purity," "The White Ribbon," "Alcoholics and Narcotics" and "Suffrage" were well represented. Rev. Knowles, of Medina, gave a fine address on "The different stages of temperance reform." The impressive memorial service for Mary Allen West was led by a new member. The superintendent of Temple work reported the one hundred dollars pledged all paid, and a small surplus in the treasury. Four new members were received, each being given a white-ribbon pin by the president. Rev. Henrietta Moore, Springfield, delivered the address of the evening. It was full of strong common sense, and much enjoyed by all present. She also addressed a large audience in one of the Medina churches the following Sabbath evening, four churches having joined in a mass-meeting to hear her.

Mrs. Phebe S. Reeves, Frankfort, Ross county, organized a Y in her home with the following officers: President, Mrs. Laura Pancake; secretary, Miss Bell Phillips; treasurer, Miss Jennie Jones. The new society's first parlor meeting was a success. Thirty-five young people were present. A sister writes: "The L. T. L. which Mrs. Hammond went out in a pouring rain to address three years ago is doing good work; they helped to build a new and commodious church, and gave their leader, Mrs. Sadie Crabb, a Christmas present of 'Glimpses of Fifty Years.' The work is growing in Ross county."

Our energetic district president held two meetings at Avon Lake, on which occasion the union was increased by ten members. Avon Lake union has held five Demorest contests, four silver and one gold, has distributed one hundred leaflets. They faithfully circulated literature at all public meetings. This union is right among the vineyards and wine cellars, but its members are intensely in earnest. A distillery "talks of coming"—the local W. C. T. U. will have something to say about it.

There has been a "gathering in" of our dearest and best, which has left vacancies in our ranks hard to fill, and yet the work will go on! We somehow feel, though they have passed

"Beyond the smiling and the weeping,
Beyond the waking and the sleeping,
Beyond the sowing and the reaping," that they are in touch with us; Jennie Casseday, our very own, for she lives in hearts the wide world over, who can think of her as other than a co-worker? Mt. Blanchard W. C. T. U. mourns the loss of a beloved sister, Mrs. M. G. Palmer, its late president. Coshocton has lost a most efficient worker, for three years its Y president, Mrs. Mary Crowley Bonnett. In the sudden translation of Rev. and Mrs. G. A. Reeder, the Christian temperance work at Olmsted Falls, suffers untold loss. Ah well, let us so far as we may, pick up the tasks their tired hands laid down.

"Our lamps we'll fill brimfu' o' oil
That's guid and pure, that wadna spoil
And keep them burning a' the while,
To light our way.
Our wark bein' done we'll quit the soil
Maist onie day."

Mrs. Judge Lamson, evangelist of East End W. C. T. U., Cleveland, assisted by Rev. Joseph Smith, Indianapolis, held a ten days' pentacostal meeting in the Baptist church. The meeting was undenominational. Crowds representing many churches pressed forward to the altar, seeking pardon or the higher Christian life. The work is being carried on at the East End W. C. T. U. headquarters. Excellent work is being done by Cleveland Y's and L. T. L's. Parlor meetings, lectures, flower mission, literary circles, distribution of literature with various other lines of work are intelligently and enthusiastically followed.

Ohio white-ribboners are interested in three bills coming before the present legislature; the school franchise for women, the police matron bill to compel all cities having twenty-five thousand population to provide police matrons over thirty years of age, and the bill to raise the age of consent from fourteen to eighteen years of age. By the joint efforts of the state W. S. A. and the W. C. T. U. a bill was passed requiring the appointment of one woman physician in every insane asylum, and making it mandatory upon judges of common pleas to appoint for the public institutions in each county, visiting boards consisting of three men and three women. This has resulted in the appointment of two hundred and sixty-four women. The Ohio W. S. A. has secured the service of Mrs. Sarah C. Schrader, of Chillicothe, to further the interests of the Doty school suffrage bill. Mrs. Schrader rendered efficient aid to this measure last winter, and she will be assisted by Mrs. Alice H. Peters and Mrs. E. Coit, both of Columbus.

BUCKEYE BITS.

Self-denial Week, April 3–10.

Fourteen new unions reported, and one re-organized.

A bequest of five hundred dollars comes to the Ohio W. C. T. U. this year from the estate of Mrs. Katharine Vinal, deceased, of East Toledo.

The Ohio enrollment for full suffrage, 25,000 names, is now beautifully bound at Columbus to back up the school franchise bill, for full suffrage includes that and more.

The Ohio Children's Home Society, an auxiliary to the National Children's Home Society of Chicago, was organized February 23, with headquarters at Columbus, William McKinley, president. The state board of managers is composed of twenty men and five women.

Mother Stewart is happily convalescing from another attack of la grippe.

Huron county has live unions and intelligent workers. Peru, with a membership of sixteen, takes ten copies of the Messenger.

Mrs. W. A. Ingham, of Cleveland, a dauntless Crusade leader in those "days to be remembered," is preparing a Columbian record of Cleveland's notable women. The list begins with the century, and names 1,000 women prominent in educational, literary, temperance, missionary, professional and other activities. This book will have more than local interest, and will prove a valuable contribution to woman's corner at the big Fair.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

LEGISLATIVE NOTES.

The South Dakota legislature is of the past. After the smoke of battle passes away, one pauses to take breath and recount the struggles and the victories gained. Resubmission failed, though its friends not daunted by the February victory, brought the bill up again just before the close of the session. Mr. Patten, of Beadle county, changed his vote in accordance with the wishes of his constituents and in his so doing, resubmission was lost and the fair young state of South Dakota once more gained a victory over wrong.

At the time of the conflict, February 2 and 3, the excitement was intense. Visitors filled the hall of representatives to its utmost capacity. Many white-ribboners were on hand with hearts full of faith and prayer. The legislature of '93 deserves great credit for its firmness and honesty in standing up for the people, against the powerful whisky lobby.

Our state president, Mrs. Emma Cramner and her faithful assistant, Mrs. Anna Simmons, were tireless in their efforts. They testify to the fact that they were treated with great respect by the members of the legislature and invited to attend all the meetings of the temperance committee. Mrs. Simmons, in one of her speeches, raised her Bible and said: "Gentlemen, here is a law that will never be repealed," and when she closed she said, "Let us pray." It reminded one of the Crusade. Men bowed their heads that morning, some of whom may not have heard a prayer for years. Seed was sown in that committee—some of which will bear fruit for eternity.

Judge Hooper, of Redfield, Spink county, was presented with a gold-headed cane for the masterly way in which he led the temperance forces. The bill that, at least one woman shall be placed upon the boards of charitable, penal and educational institutions became a law. Women, too, have a voice in school elections, and are eligible to a place on the school boards of the state. A bill has passed making it obligatory upon a sheriff to see that a woman accompany a female patient to and from the insane asylum. Great credit is due to our beloved president for the passage of this bill and for earnest work all along the line.

The ladies of the several unions of Pierre gave the friends of temperance a very pleasant reception, February 10, in one of the rooms of the "Fitch block." Mr. Royal F. King, one of Pierre's stanchest temperance men, kindly gave the use of the room, and the ladies did all in their power to make the occasion a pleasant one for the legislators and their lady friends, many of whom lent the grace of their presence. Pretty souvenirs were prepared and given to each gentleman as he entered. The souvenirs were made of handsome opal-colored paper, and contained the National motto, "For God and Home and Native Land;" the date, and "W. C. T. U. Reception," tied with the traditional white ribbon and folded in an unique way, they were very attractive. Good music lent its own charm. The guests, led by Mrs. King, sang "My country 'tis of Thee," "John Brown's body," etc. Fragrant coffee, and such cake as the Pierre W. C. T. U. ladies know how to make did good service toward the general cheer. The East Pierre union came over twenty-five strong, and added immeasurably to the enjoyment of the occasion.

Some of the local unions of the state pledged themselves to observe the noontide hour of prayer, as suggested by the White Ribbon Journal, with the petition, "O Lord, let the cause of temperance prevail, let there be no resubmission of our prohibitory statutes, and let righteousness cover the earth, as the waves cover the sea." The band of white-ribboners gathered at the capitol and having faith in the wonderful power of prayer, believe that this has greatly helped to bring to pass the good results gained by the severe campaign of 1893.

Movements are on foot, now joined in most heartily by the better element of the capital city, to close the saloons and the houses of prostitution. It is believed that this

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE autograph cards for the children's chain should be sent only to Miss Anna A. Gordon, Evanston, Ill.

WARREN county, N. Y., held an especially good all-day convention at Warrensburgh, March 9, attended by a large delegation.

MRS. R. W. MARRIAGE, Iowa's superintendent of peace and arbitration, has changed her home from Iowa Falls to North Market street, Oskaloosa, Iowa.

IN the official communication of the World's treasurer, Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, the types gave the total of thank-offering for the World's treasurer as $122.19 instead of $322.19

OLNEY, Ill., which has always been considered a stronghold of the rum power, testifies to the work and worth of Colonel Holt, the temperance evangelist, recently among them.

MRS. LUCINDA A. PACKER, recently president of the Central W. C. T. U., Cincinnati, O., died February 15, after an illness of three days. A worthy wearer of the white ribbon, her associates bear testimony to her zeal, fidelity and womanly worth, and cherish her memory as one of the few in Cincinnati who dared to avow her hostility to the liquor traffic, and her desire that the state should prohibit it at once and forever.

THE women of California are making strong and determined efforts to secure the right of citizenship. A bill for school and municipal suffrage for women was introduced early in the present session, and from the first has been under the skillful management of Mrs. B. Sturtevant Peet, president of California W. C. T. U. The able superintendent of the franchise department, Miss Sarah E. Severance, is widely and favorably known throughout the state. Success to their efforts.

SOUTH DAKOTA is the first state to introduce in its legislature a bill making physical education compulsory in the public school system. This means without limitation. The bill passed the house 80 to 3, but was lost in the senate through the influence of one or two members, who would naturally oppose a measure supported by the W. C. T. U. Great credit is due Honorable Sheldon, who championed the bill in the house. South Dakota's president, Mrs. Cramner, has made a notable legislative run, during a period of sixty days.

RICHMOND, Va., W. C. T. U. and many other ladies have been much helped by the teachings of Dr. Mary Wood Allen, National superintendent of social purity, during her stay in that city. Her public lectures were listened to by large audiences and a series of health lectures for women and girls, given in the parlors of the Woman's Christian Association were well attended. A White Cross Society and a White Shield Society were formed as the result of her work among the colored people, under the auspices of the colored W. C. T. U. Dr. Allen has since been in Florida, recruiting, but will start northward soon.

MRS. GRUBB, National superintendent of Work Among Foreigners has gotten out an edition in German of Mary Allen West's tract on unfermented wine. It is one of the "Friendly Talk" series and is called "Ought Alcohol to be used at the Lord's Supper?" A new Swedish tract on the same subject, written by Rev. K. A. Ostergren, of Duluth, Minn., a Baptist minister, is now ready. This logical and convincing leaflet has also been published in Norwegian and Danish and ought to be put into the hands of every Swedish and Norwegian minister. Mrs. Grubb has been obliged to be away from home for some time with an invalid daughter, but all orders are filled by her secretary. Address as usual, Mrs. S. F. Grubb, Lawrence, Kansas.

A CALL to the help of unprotected girls in Chicago during the World's Fair has been issued by Mrs. Carse, president of the Chicago Central W. C. T. U., who says that "unless Christian womanhood combine to aid their weaker sisters thousands of innocent girls during the next few months will be swept into the maelstrom of hopeless harlotage." This appalling condition of affairs, and how to meet it, should be thoroughly understood by Christian women. Mrs. Daisy H. Carlock, corresponding secretary of Chicago Central W. C. T. U., who has the Willard Hall daily noon prayer-meetings in charge, will accept invitations to go before any ladies' church or missionary society in the vicinity of Chicago, and present to them, "The duty which Christian women owe to the innocent and unfortunate of their own sex during the World's Columbian Exposition." Address her at Room 1101, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

AN EASTER OFFERING.

BY EMMA E. VOLENTINE.

Our choicest offerings we bring,
To Thee, this day, O Christ, our King,
And lay them at Thy feet.
Our hands hold lilies fair, to grace
The altars of the holy place,—
Fair lilies, pure and sweet.

Fit types are these, without a stain,
Of that life given once to gain
For us relief from sin.
Glad emblems, too, of life in death;
"The Lord is risen," with joyous breath,
Each pæan shall begin.

A living Christ; a risen Lord;
No terror can the grave afford;
We conquer in his name!
Our hearts to Thee, O Christ, we bring,
Our lives are henceforth Thine, our King,
Or life, or death, the same.

EASTER MONDAY AT THE CAPITOL.

BY IDA W. JEROME.

Eggs green, and blue and red! a whole basket full of them. And here another, and there another. And here is a dainty fairy in golden ringlets, carrying her basket of golden eggs. Can it be that very fairy who l›d "Jack" of bean stalk fame to the giant's castle, and are these the eggs laid by the giant's red hen? Or is this the home of King Midas, and has he placed his touch upon the eggs and upon the golden curls?

But we must not stop here, for they are coming all about us more and more, baskets and baskets filled with eggs—red and purple, blue and pink, rose color, and all the varied hues that the dyer's art can give. Baskets, little and big, wo‹en into finest designs, or made up in clumsiest fashions, presided over by beautiful little children, dressed in becoming costumes, in charge of dusky nurses, or by colored children, who come forth unattended, all bent upon the same purpose, to have a joyous holiday.

What a proud day for all the feathered tribe, from the bird of paradise down to the bantam of the hen-yard, if they could but look upon the scene! If only all hendom could be here, what a cackling there would be.

We had come to visit the National Capitol, and had heard that on the Monday following Easter it was the custom of the city for people of all classes, ages and stations to gather on the grounds of the White House and watch the children play at egg-rolling, a day and privilege especially for the amusement of the little ones, but engaged in by many thousands of their elders.

For this occasion the White House grounds are given up to the public from early morning until five in the afternoon. No one is admitted after that hour. Only a small area of a few feet in width immediately adjoining the mansion is reserved and enclosed by a fence.

By nine o'clock crowds of men, women and children were seen on the streets, all going toward the White House grounds, many to engage with the children in their yearly entertainment, and many to witness it for the first time.

As we reached the gateway the crowd was so dense that only by being carried along with it were we able to enter. It was estimated that there were upon the grounds at one time fifteen thousand persons. Large numbers, too, were constantly going and coming. Here and there children and nurses were seated upon the ground playing at egg-rolling, or egg-picking.

The latter game consists in two persons striking together the ends of their eggs, one held in the right hand of each. The broken egg was yielded to the winner, who ate it or threw it upon the ground. And when at evening, the work of the day over, we gazed upon what in the morning was a clean, beautiful lawn of velvety green, we saw only a demented egg salad of huge proportions.

This custom of egg-rolling is a very ancient one, dating back hundreds of years. The pagans worshiped Ostera, the goddess of spring, and the early Christians changed these pagan ceremonies into religious festivals. Eggs were considered symbolic of the revival of nature. This festival is still observed in Scotland, as it has been for centuries. It is believed to have been brought by the Scotch to Washington, where they owned large tracts of land.

The custom in this country is, I think, confined to the city of Washington. It is engaged in there by all classes, but will hardly be adopted elsewhere, as it seems to gain much of its interest and enthusiasm from location.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

MORE PLANE AND THE BOOTJACK.

Morning! But why didn't you come earlier? Breakfast, and chickens to feed, and baby to dress, and half a mile to walk. Well, we must finish up this plane business before we have another play spell in making something. Ground a plane, did you, Tom? And Jimmy has fixed up a chisel. Same way, both of 'em. What's that you're unwrapping so carefully, Helen? A plane-iron, sure enough. Ground it yourself, with Florence to turn? Tom, was yours as well done as this? Clap it under the try-square. Fairly well done, my girl, if you are only thirteen. That corner, you see, is a hair shorter than this one, and the curve is not quite uniform, but it is good enough, and I am much pleased with it.

Now let me tell you how to use a plane,—for it is not exactly an ornamental object. Guess I'll let you learn for yourselves how to plane the side of a board—not often necessary in these days of planing mills,—and I will tell you only about the edge. First, last, midst and always, you must try to hold the plane level, so that the edge of the board will form a right angle with the side. Practice, practice, practice, and use the try-square after every stroke.

Next, make yourselves think that planing is easy work. Don't make a wild dash, like an uninstructed boy with a dull scythe, but hold yourselves under control, like carpenter Brown. He walks the whole length of a long board, planing as he goes, and sometimes stopping and starting without lifting the plane. But you will generally use short boards, and that will bring us to the next difficulty.

When starting a stroke, you will be almost sure to drop the heel of your plane and so round the corner of the board. And about nineteen times in thirteen you will draw the plane farther back than is necessary. Also at the other end you will drop the toe of the plane and so round that corner too. The remedy is first, careful and constant attention; next, do not draw the plane back too far, thus leaving as much as possible on the board, where you can press down with the left hand. Then hold the heel up by the handle. Practice alone can make perfect. At the end of the stroke, reverse the order; that is, bear down on the heel, hold up the toe and do not go too far.

That must suffice about planing. Just a word as to the planes themselves. Get any old thing for rough work, but for regular use get a modern plane if you can. They are called self-setting, but they do not set themselves. There is a screw in front of the handle, to be operated without stopping your work. This is good, but there is a better one which has, in addition to the setting-screw, a lever just over the front part of the handle, which throws the iron from side to side and so adjusts the cutting edge to the face. This is perfection.

When a plane clogs don't try too hard to make it clear itself; it will never do it. Be careful in clearing it not to injure the edge. Better use a thin wedge of soft pine. Clogging comes oftenest from two causes: Wet, splintery wood and too narrow throat. The only cure for the first is to dry the wood. For a narrow throat take a chisel and cut a wide one. I do not know of any objection in common work, to a full quarter inch space in front of the cutting edge, but an eighth will meet all requirements.

Yes, the bootjack at last. Take a piece of clear pine, such as you find in old boxes, 1x6x22. At 11 from one end begin a taper toward the other end, to 4 or less. The wide end is the toe. You needn't look so surprised; just wait. At 12 from the toe put a block a cross, 1½ high at the side, and slanted to let the heel touch the floor. Bore a ½ inch hole in the middle of the board, just at the toe side of the block. Mark a center line to the toe. At 5½ from the toe, measure each way on a cross-line, 2 inches. From these points mark straight to the outside of the hole aforesaid. Going toe-ward—how's that for a word?—you maintain the four-inch width for an inch or more, and then start on a graceful curve with its center, one inch short of the toe. Now saw out this apple-seed and you have a bootjack that will never balk nor kick, with a fine cross-piece to hold the toe of the boot, so you need not use the poker. It will bite anything from the baby's shoe up, and is large enough for a No. 10. Round off the toe corners, and smooth it up generally. No, you don't want a hole to hang it up by. A bootjack's place is on the floor, right back of the neat row of shoes which, of course, you keep, and then it is always ready for use. Off with you now!

Vineland, N. J.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Easter greetings to you all! In olden times friends saluted each other on Easter day by saying, "The Lord is risen!" the reply being, "The Lord is risen indeed!" Wasn't that a beautiful way? I wish for the boys and girls in our world wide temperance circle that "The Lord is risen indeed," showing in their actions that His spirit has come to live in their hearts to-day. You cannot show this better than by doing something for some one else, than by being self-denying, thoughtful of others, sunny-tempered, helpful and true—real temperance workers.

Did you know that the Easter eggs which are so common a token at this time have a deep and holy meaning? They mean Christ's coming to life again—the resurrection—and they are colored red to represent His blood shed on the cross, when He gave Himself for us.

Let us observe this joyful and holy festival of Easter, remembering these things.

Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

A TEMPERANCE SOCIAL.

After a season of social converse at a young people's gathering, the following plan will be found an interesting medium of pleasure and profit. A leader is selected who is provided with a list of ten or twelve name definitions. These may be:

1. To bequeath and to fatten. (Willard.)
2. A season of the year and to place. (Somerset.)
3. Pierced and a preposition. (Gordon.)
4. To assume a lowly attitude and half of window. (Neal Dow.)
5. A small bird. (Finch.)
6. Like the covering of sheep. (Woolley.)
7. A rule of action and a descendant. (Lawson.)
8. A linen shirt front. (Dickie.)
9. A public treasury. (Fisk.)
10. A foolish clown. (Gough.)
11. One of the apostles and in the same manner. (Lucas.)
12. The abbreviation of a certain political party, an interjection and quiet. (Demorest.)

The company is provided with cards, on which are twelve numbered blanks for the names when guessed. The card itself should also be numbered, or the name of the person written thereon. When all are ready a bell is struck and the leader reads definition number 1. At the end of five minutes the bell is again sounded, and definition number 2 is delivered, the same time for guessing being allowed between each number. At the close the cards are collected and a souvenir is awarded to the successful contestant. The last may be a pretty pledge book, a year's subscription to the Oak and Ivy Leaf, or a copy of "A Life of Service," "Thumb Nail Sketches," or "A Young Woman's Notion."

This and many other entertainments of interest can be found in the

of March, 1893 (Social Entertainment Number).

Chicago, Ill.

A little book of one hundred and twenty-four pages has been brought out by Dr. Mary Wood Allen, the new superintendent of W. C. T. U. work for social purity. It is entitled, TEACHING TRUTH, and has on its title pages these mottoes, "Dare to be True," "Nothing Needs a Lie," by George Herbert, and the following couplet from Arbuthnot:

"Oh, truth divine, enlightened by thy ray,
I grope and gaze no more to see my way."

The preface of the book contains the well-known and beautiful poem by George McDonald, entitled, "Where did you come from, baby, dear?" This is followed by an allegory, in which the wonders and beauties of the natural world are made to veil their meaning, by others often too rudely told. It would be well were this little book in the hands of every father and mother in the nation.

By request of Miss Willard we have added to our stock TEACHING TRUTH, which we will send postpaid to any address upon receipt of 30 cents.

RAILWAY NOTES.

"The Louisville, New Albany & Chicago has just added to its rolling-stock two new sleeping and boudoir cars, costing nearly $45,000 each. These cars are said to be the finest ever placed on any road in the country, and are specially designed for use during the World's Columbian Exposition."

These cars are models of elegance and beauty, each Compartment or Boudoir being fitted with a complete toilet set, cleverly hidden from view when not in use. They are in daily service between Chicago and Cincinnati, and should be seen and used to be fully appreciated.

All of the Monon's through day trains are made up of new coaches and Parlor and Dining Cars.

CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

Write to John J. Byrne, Asst. Passenger Traffic Manager, 723 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., if you are interested in California, and he will send you some reading matter.

IN A NEWSPAPER'S LIBRARY.

Journals Want Books Filled Only With Hard, Solid Facts.

Perhaps no library is more carefully selected than the working library of a newspaper. There is no telling what the next hour will bring forth in the world of news, and yet a newspaper must be prepared to accept everything that comes along. Naturally its library contains books for work, not for show or mental diversion.

For that reason the volumes on the shelves are largely books of reference, biography, history, geography, science, arts and statistics. The selection must cover so much ground that any question submitted can either be answered in a few minutes, or after the further searchings suggested by some printed authority in the newspaper library. There is one work, however, that is invaluable to the newspaper man—the REVISED ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA. No work of reference is handled as often, no other volumes are opened as frequently and no other product of the publisher's art is valued as highly as the epitome of the world's knowledge—the REVISED ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA.

From M. G. Kennedy, whose name is a household word among Sunday-school workers:

"The Quarterly Lesson came just in time for me to put your cholera ship on the board for Sunday's lesson. We have a good many boys of ten to thirteen, and they were very certain that neither ship should land. The reasons they gave why the cholera ship should not land were easily turned into reasons why the other should not.

How do I like The Advance Guard? Very much. Go on with it. What a mistake it is not to cater to the "big boys and girls!" I hope it will be a great success as to its circulation."

A leaflet entitled "New Plans for the L. T. L." has just been issued from the W. T. P. A. presses, and will be sent free to all who ask for it. It is a reprint from the January and February numbers of The Advance Guard, and is the latest authority relative to "diplomas and seals." If you, as a juvenile worker, wish to know all about these, and also of the League of True Legioners, the Home Guard Circle and the Guild of the Tricolor, send for this leaflet.

Columbus was the first American in spirit and practice. The book "Columbus and What He Found," tells of his deeds and his patriotism in a thrilling manner, showing the little ones how this great country was discovered through faith in God and love of freedom. Before the great Fair in Chicago opens every boy and girl should be taught that the ovation is in recognition of such a hero. The book is a souvenir of the Fair. Price $1.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Forest fires have been raging in New Jersey.

The churches generally observed Easter Sunday by fitting services, April 2.

Parliament reassembled in London, Tuesday, after a three days' Easter recess.

Four thousand houses were consumed by fire at Manila, Philippine Islands, April 1.

The anti-Pinkerton bill, forbidding police powers to a non-resident of the state, has become a law in Minnesota.

The powerful school book monopoly, called the American Book Company, is being investigated by the Illinois senate committee.

A class of thirty young women medical students graduated from the woman's medical department of the Northwestern University, March 30.

The seventy-eighth birthday of Prince Bismarck, which occurred April 1, was publicly celebrated in Germany last Tuesday with great rejoicing.

Ex-Secretary of State Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, has been appointed by President Cleveland as United States ambassador to England.

Following the resignation of the Ribot ministry in Paris last Friday, M. Felix Jules Meline, at the request of President Carnot, formed a new cabinet.

The cases of the United States and Great Britain (Behring Seas fisheries) were sent synchronously to the United States Senate and the British Parliament, March 30, for arbitration.

An excursion train which jumped the track near Leadville, Col., March 31, hurled three hundred passengers down an embankment, killing many and seriously injuring the rest.

The Afro-Americans of Iowa met in convention at Des Moines last week, forming a permanent organization and protesting against the disfranchisement of colored men in the South.

The anti-gambling bill passed the Illinois house by a vote of one hundred and twenty-five to seven last Thursday, its consideration in the senate being postponed until April 6.

The registration of women for the municipal elections in Kansas was very large. These elections were conducted under the new law which provides that liquors, cigars and carriages cannot be used to secure votes.

OUR ever-generous friend, Ferdinand Schumacher, the "oatmeal king," who helped Miss West with her school of methods, has sent fifty dollars to Mrs. A. L. Pease, Asheville, N. C., to help forward the building for the Southern School of Methods, which is to be made a memorial of Miss West.

IF every one of the twenty million Christians in the United States were as energetic, consistent and fearless as our brother, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, D. D., of the Christian Statesman, evil would be forthwith stamped out of every official and public act. In a recent "open letter to Hon. C. C. Bonney, the president of the World's Fair Congresses," he declines to participate in the World's Congresses on missions, Sabbath and temperance, "unless the conduct of the World's Fair shall be brought into harmony with state and national law," spurred to this action by the efforts of the World's Fair Directory to violate the Sabbath laws and its evident disregard of the local prohibitory enactments in its liquor-selling concessions. The action of the Directory in these matters is certainly of a nature to call forth the unqualified condemnation of all law-loving and law-abiding individuals and organizations. Sunday closing of the Fair seems assured, however, and we have yet to see whether the established prohibition laws of a district can be transgressed with impunity.

A CO-OPERATIVE and social organization of young people, which has been in successful operation in Chicago for several months, is known as the Young Folks' Club and is located at 47–51 University Place. The object of the club is to furnish a comfortable and congenial home-life to young people at a reasonable sum, and at a nominal price to provide reading-rooms and good entertainments for residents of the home and outside members. A Chautauqua circle has been organized with a large membership.

THE bronze Japanese bell, tolled at Miss West's funeral in Tokyo, has arrived in Chicago. The inscription on it in Japanese translates into English as follows: "This bell cast in the city of Tokyo, December 10, 1892, by Tsuda Sen, is made from the metal of tobacco pipes of more than a thousand men, once slaves, now freemen." This inscription will also be engraved in English, French and German, and the bell will receive a prominent position in the World's Fair. Afterward, according to the request of the donor, it will be placed where it can be used as a bell, not merely exhibited as a curiosity. Having no clapper, it will be hung on a hook and struck by a pole.

THE chairman of the California prohibition committee, J. M. Glass, writes: "My knowledge of history, civil government and the rise and fall of political parties convinces me that we are about ready for a union of congenial reform forces upon the four great questions that are crying aloud for settlement, to wit: Prohibition, woman's suffrage, transportation and finance. Women must come to the front in all things and have the ballot before we can attain to a high standard of Christian civilization." These are strong words from this prohibition leader, and we rejoice that they represent the conviction of a large proportion of our brothers-in-law.

OF great interest to active Prohibitionists will be the National Convention of the Inter-Collegiate Prohibition Association to be held at Harvey, Ill., June 28–30. College men will furnish papers and discussions. Gov. St. John, of Kansas, Chairman Dickie, of Michigan, Colonel Ritter, of Indiana, E. J. Wheeler, of New York, and President J. W. Bashford, of Ohio, have promised to give addresses and Miss Willard has also been invited to speak. Strong clubs have been organized in a number of the leading colleges as well as normal schools and smaller institutions, the enrolled membership being 3,500 members, and the convention will doubtless be of great importance and value to our cause.

ONE of the most unique personalities who will be present at the Women's Congress will be Miss Jessie Ackermann, of Sydney, Australia, a young New England woman—by birth a native of Boston—but one who has lived in New Orleans and San Francisco. She is capable and adventurous in spirit, so that we, knowing her to be equal to the occasion, and having high testimonials of her character and ability from our Californian women, sent her out in 1887 to develop the white ribbon movement in the Sandwich Islands, Australia, New Zealand, India, China, Japan and all "along shore." She has never received a penny from us, but her excellent abilities as a speaker have borne her along—the people have rallied to her side, and she may justly be called the mother of the Australian W. C. T. U. of which she is now president. Within a few months she has made a tour of reconnaissance for us in India, and will return to her native land via Australia, reaching San Francisco in time, as we hope and expect, to be present at the Women's Congress, May 15. She will speak on her six years observations of women in Asia, Africa and Australia, and will also hold conferences in the interest of the World's W. C. T. U. Miss Ackermann will remain to participate in the World's and National W. C. T. U. Conventions, beginning October 16, in connection with the Columbian Exposition.

"CHAMPAGNE MIST" is the name of a new drink that was introduced into soda fountains last summer and bids fair to be widely used the coming season. It was originally advertised as a non-alcoholic drink, but Uncle Sam discovered that there was enough alcohol in it to justify the government in demanding its license fee of the manufacturer, hence the delusion as to its non-intoxicating qualities is being dispelled. But young people need to be faithfully warned against its seductions and every W. C. T. U. woman should be on the alert to denounce both its use and sale. It will probably be widely used in soda fountains at the World's Fair.

WILLARD HALL has become a Mecca to those seeking a brief respite from the business cares of the day during the noon hour. Within this beautiful cloister embedded among the business blocks of the great city, many hearts are turned toward higher things, and the windows of many a soul are "opened toward Jerusalem." Friends of the white-ribbon army and believers in its great mission, passing through the city, turn aside here for a heart-to-heart communion. Only last Friday, two Daughters of the King, Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, editor, and Mrs. Isabella Davis, publisher of the Silver Cross, came in upon us unexpectedly, as also our brother, John G. Woolley, all of whom added by their presence and participation a higher inspiration to the meeting, which was conducted by Dr. J. R. Boynton, of the National Temperance Hospital staff.

MISS HELEN L. HOOD, so long corresponding secretary of Illinois, writes from London as follows: "I wish to say how pained I have been at the attacks made upon the Temple and the integrity of Mrs. Carse, and at a time when she was ill and away from the city. As secretary of the board of the building association, I want to say that all the transactions have been carried on in a business-like and straightforward manner. An examination of the affairs of the Temple will, I know, only demonstrate the honest way in which the work of collecting and distributing the funds for this great enterprise which is ours, has been conducted. Fifteen years of close acquaintance and daily contact with Mrs. Carse make me know what a true comrade she is—how loving and sympathetic a woman, and that among us all we have no one more true to principle. My confidence in her business energy and good sense is complete, and I wholly and fully trust her."

A CONTEMPORARY religious paper after making some excellent remarks upon the dishonorable conduct of those who are trying to make it appear that Congress has no right to close the Fair on Sunday, expresses the following strange sentiment: "The antecedent debate on the question has done a wide harm which ten Fairs cannot heal. Hundreds of thousands have been induced to adopt and approve a line of argument that strikes at the vitals both of a Sunday for rest and a Sabbath for worship." If this be true, then agitation on all subjects, except where things are so bad they cannot be made worse, is an evil; for discussions of this kind always confirm some in their wrong ideas and bring to the same view others who were before undecided. To accept this statement would be to admit that it is truth, not error, which suffers by the light. We do not doubt that some are more obstinately wrong than ever and others who before were undecided have now gone hopelessly on to the wrong side of the question; but we also believe that some who were before undecided have now decided for the right and we must believe that it is the majority who have so decided, but, whatever may be the relative numbers, it is certain that people might about as well be wrong as to have no opinion on a subject. Those who are on the fence are of no more benefit to a cause and of not much less injury than those who are outspoken against it. Whatever may be the immediate effects of the discussion on the Sabbath question, we have not the least doubt that the effect in the long future must be wholesome.

MARY MAGDALENE'S EASTER.

BY EMMA PLAYTER SEABURY.

Mary Magdalene, Mary Magdalene;
Hurrying on through the crowded street,
Jostling and jeering, scorning and fearing,
Parted the crowd as she pushed on the faster,
Bent on one purpose, on seeing the Master;
Beautiful, penitent, burdened with sin,
Longing to see Him, to touch Him; within,
Prostrate and tearful she kneels at His feet.

Mary Magdalene, Mary Magdalene,
Shunned and rebuked by His chosen few,
As virtue still turning the weak ones is spurning;
Questioning, pale, would she be disappointed?
Bent her head lower, and sadly anointed.
Scornful the Pharisee: "Lowest and least Thou art unbidden; unknown at the feast!"
Christ adds: "All sinners are welcome here too."

Mary Magdalene, Mary Magdalene,
Kneeling in prayers and tears at the cross,
Faithful beside Him when others deride Him,
Hoping and fearing, her full heart is rending—
Will He not save Himself? calmly descending
Throw off His mantle of sorrow and shame,
Gather His nations, His kingdom proclaim?
Crushed with a hopelessness born of her loss.

Mary Magdalene, Mary Magdalene,
All thou hadst in His tomb was laid,
The one bright dreaming o'er thy life beaming,
Was in the love that His death had banished:
Out in the night of thy misery vanished,
Never was grieving plunged down so low,
From a heaven of hope to a hell of woe,
Through a mist of shadow, and doubt and pain.

Mary Magdalene, Mary Magdalene,
Last at the cross, at the tomb the first,
Scarcely divining the angel shining.
The glory over the doorway streaming,
Her risen Lord in the morning's gleaming;
Questioning not, as He stood beside,
While the rapturous glow of the Easter-tide
Over her dazzled vision burst.

Mary Magdalene, Mary Magdalene,
The Christ came first to the heart that feared,
Of all that were grieving, the faithful believing,
He chose thee, because thy sorrow was bleeding,
Because of thy sinning the greater thy needing,
Because thou wert weakest His love was so strong,
Because thou wert tempted from anguish to wrong,
Thy trembling soul and its faith He cheered.

Mary Magdalene, Mary Magdalene,
Would we learn from this Easter lesson to-day
What the Christ love brought us, the Christ love taught us?
Charity means more than simply relenting,
Means loving not judging the sinning, repenting,
Helping, uplifting the spirits that plead,
Giving a hand in their bitterest need,—
It were Easter dawn in our hearts alway.

GRAN'SIR SAXTON'S VOTE.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

"Now, that's outrageous mean!" said Eri Saxton as he finished reading a letter. "I've got to start right away to Windsor on brother Nathan's lawsuit business, and that means losing my vote to-morrow."

"Couldn't the business be postponed?" inquired his wife, pausing on her way to the pantry

"Postponed! why, no. Lawsuit business can't be postponed; I should think you'd know that." A few minutes of quiet followed in which Mr. Saxton busied himself with jamming into an old-fashioned valise a few articles for his hasty trip. Then he called:

"Mirandy, why can't you come and pack this 'ere bag for me? Strange you don't help me get ready."

"Of course I will," responded his wife, "my hands were in my bread." She smiled to see the confused mass of things he needed and things he did not need, and proceeded to smooth, separate, fold and pack, while he counted his money with an eye to probable traveling expenses.

"I'll leave you a dollar, Mirandy, for you might need it," said he. "And there's Gran'sir! you must see that he gets to the village to vote to-morrow. Things'll rub pretty close this year, best we can do, and every man that can hold a ballot has got to be there. You'll have to send word to somebody to come after him. There's enough that'll be glad to do it if they know I'm away."

"Well, Eri, I guess I can take Gran'sir over all right. You talk as if I never harnessed a horse or drove a mile. Gran'sir, you'd rather have me drive you over than send for anybody, wouldn't you? Eri's got to go to Windsor on Nathan's lawsuit business," said Mrs. Saxton, as a large, pleasant-faced old gentleman limped into the room.

"Got to go to Win'sor? Wal, I hope Nathan'll beat—yes, I do. Why, yes, Mirandy can drive me over. I'll risk her," said he.

Mrs. Saxton had crowded a nice lunch into the small bag, fastened it securely, and was now rubbing the worn leather with a little shoe-polish, unobserved by her husband. But she suddenly paused and looked toward him.

"By the way, Eri," said she earnestly, "you and father will vote 'no-license,' won't you? That is, you would if you could, wouldn't you? Because Mrs. Danforth says there's danger that the other side will win this year. She says the mill hands will vote for the party that gives them saloons; and that so many Germans have come in, that the party—"

"Mirandy! I do wish you wouldn't undertake to talk about parties," interrupted Mr. Saxton. "Gran'sir and I vote just according as we want to. We have to look at all sides of a question, and Mis' Danforth, and some other women, that don't live a thousand miles from here, can't see but one side any way they can fix it. I know now why Mis' Danforth was out on the back road yesterday. She was trying to get men to promise how they'd vote! I s'pose poor Danforth had to get his own supper." Mr. Saxton had been struggling into his overcoat, and at that moment an inconsiderate button gave way and rolled across the floor.

"There, Mirandy! see what you made me do," he cried. "It's only half an hour before my train starts, and I've got a mile to walk. Hurry up, now, with that button!"

Mrs. Saxton flew for thread, needle and the depraved button, and her liege lord was obliged to stand still while she sewed it on, but this gave him an opportunity to pursue the subject under consideration.

"This license and no-license business don't amount to anything, best you can fix it. Take our town, for example. If Goshen goes 'dry,' and East Goshen goes 'wet,' why them that wants liquor'll go right over there and leave Goshen money circulating round in East Goshen. And if Goshen goes 'wet,' why vicy versy, the terms being reversed, and the shoe's on the other foot. Goshen gets East Goshen money, which, if the money must be spent, is better for Goshen. Then, again, Mirandy, you know's well's I do that the stuff's sold on the sly, best you can do. There's a good many holes in a skimmer, and there's just as many on the inside as there is on the outside."

This bit of fine logic came to an end just as the last stitch was taken, and, catching up his bag, Mr. Saxton kissed his wife, shook hands with Gran'sir, and rushed away.

An impressive silence followed. Mrs. Saxton picked up scattered articles and set the chairs straight, while the old father sat gazing into the open fire.

"Eri's kinder uncomfortable to have 'round when he's gettin' ready to go," said he, with the calm deliberation of age. "But he's better than a man that drinks or carries on any way unseemly. He means well."

"Oh, yes! yes!" assented the wife. "I wish he had your disposition, father; but it is only his way."

There were tears in her eyes as she returned to her cooking,—not because of Eri's waspish ways, entirely, for she was used to those, and so long as he kissed her at parting she could "forgive and forget." But she knew very well that his display of temper meant that he would, to help save his party from defeat, vote for license in Goshen where they had had no open saloons for three years. Of party measures she was rather ignorant, as her husband had intimated, but like most New England women she had a wide-awake conscience, and was not entirely deficient in will power. So the tears were soon dried, and she said to herself: "Thank the Lord, Eri can't vote to-morrow, and I'll see what can be done!"

The next morning she woke to hear the wind flinging sheets of rain against her window.

"It rains just like an equinoctial," remarked Gran'sir at the breakfast table, which Mrs. Saxton had made particularly attractive for him.

"Perhaps you better not try to go out in this storm," said she, "one vote won't make much difference."

"Oh, yes, I must go and vote. Eri wouldn't never overlook it if I didn't. Neither would I myself after votin' over fifty years. I guess likely the rain will hold up by-'n'-by," replied the old gentleman.

He was so very lame and clumsy that it was only on pleasant Sundays and other special occasions that his son carried him to the village, a mile distant, and Mrs. Saxton had rarely undertaken the task. But she saw his determination, and quickly said:

"Well, Gran'sir, I'll harness the horse and take you over, if you'll be sure to vote 'no-license.'"

He looked at her a moment, with a puzzled expression.

"Why, yes, I've always been a temperance man, an' I calculated I shouldn't never vote for anything else. But Eri says our party is hard pushed. He says if we can't get our share of the Germans we can't hold our own, an' they have to have their beer. Massy sakes! I don't understand it very well, but Eri was going to see that I voted so's to save Goshen to our party."

"Oh, father!" exclaimed Mrs. Saxton, "are these Germans coming in to run our politics as they run our mills? Eri can't bear your responsibility, and I'm sure he's given wrong advice. Why, Gran'sir, you don't want to see saloons opened here in Goshen again?"

"No, I don't! I don't, Mirandy, that's certain, and if Eri was here I'd talk to him."

Mrs. Saxton saw that he was troubled, and telling him to think and pray over the matter, she hurried through her work, and out to the barn to harness the horse.

The rain was still falling fitfully, and the rain blew it under her umbrella, wetting her arms even with the protection of Eri's old coat. The horse evidently had no interest in "town meeting," and laid his ears back threateningly, making her task one of mingled fear and discomfort.

"Gran'sir, I don't believe we can manage an umbrella anyway in the world. You'll have to wear Eri's storm-coat, and I'll have to pull my gossamer hood over my head," said she, when at length they were ready to start.

"Wal, we ain't neither sugar nor salt," Gran'sir replied, evidently feeling rather pleased with the prospect, and submitting like a little child to the bundling-up process. An old chair was then placed firmly on the ground beside the wagon, and by lifting and steadying, Mrs. Saxton finally succeeded in getting her charge into the vehicle, where she snugly tucked around him blanket and buffalo robe.

"It's too bad, Mirandy, that you have to do this 'ere for me," said Gran'sir, in muffled tones. "Why couldn't you go and throw a ballot for me instid of havin' all this fuss?"

Mrs. Saxton took the wet reins in her chilly fingers and climbed into the wagon, drew the edge of the robe around her and chirruped to the horse before she replied. Then, drawing a long breath she said:

"It never would do, Gran'sir! We women haven't the physical and mental strength that's necessary."

The old gentleman saw something amusing in this and chuckled and shook at intervals for several minutes.

They soon met a carriage dashing along through the mud, and Esquire Paine, one of Goshen's active politicians, drew rein beside them.

"Is that old Mr. Saxton?" he inquired. "Indeed! Well, I was just driving over for you. Some one told me your son was away. Madam, shall I relieve you of your charge?"

"No, thank you," replied Mrs. Saxton, "I can take him over."

"Very well, but, Mr. Saxton, you understand we can't indulge in much sentiment to-day," said Esquire Paine meaningly, as he drove on to look up other weather-bound superannuates.

"Now, Gran'sir, don't let any of these men persuade you to vote for license, will you? What are they thinking of? Why, you've been a temperance man all your life," cried Mrs. Saxton in real alarm.

"I know it. I don't want to go agen it. But they'll get me all worked up, and Eri says it'll be awful if we're beat this year."

They had now reached the graveyard, half way to town. It looked desolate, indeed, with its wind-bent trees, and long grass, soaked and flattened by the rain. Mrs. Saxton's heart always ached when she passed it, for there, years before, her one baby boy had been buried. She could see the tiny mound with its white stone, and, as her eyes rested upon it for a moment, a sudden thought came to her, and she said:

"Gran'sir, if Willie had lived he would be twenty-one this very month, ready to cast his first vote. Would you have advised him to vote for saloons because the party was in a tight place? And would you vote for them yourself, knowing that our boy might be drawn into them?"

Gran'sir's hearing was good, and he caught the sound of tears in her voice. He saw, too, a sudden vision of the sunny head and blue eyes of the child he had loved so well, and spoke out eagerly: "Why, no, Mirandy! I'd 'a' voted agen 'em, so I would; and that's what I'll do to-day—yes, I will, Eri or no Eri!"

"That's right, father! That's your own self! There are other boys just as dear to their mothers as Willie would have been to me."

Mrs. Saxton said no more, and very soon they reached the court-house. Half a dozen men rushed down the steps to assist the veteran voter to the ground, and he was almost borne to the door in their strong arms.

Mrs. Saxton was left sitting in the rain, for, in their eagerness, the gentleman did not seem to notice that one of the weaker sex was thus left exposed to the inclemency of the weather. But she only laughed as she waited, saying to herself:

"They'd have laid their overcoats down for me to walk on if I had had Gran'sir's ballot."

He was finally assisted down the steps and into the wagon again, while Mrs. Saxton was complimented for her share in "saving" the town. But that was Eri's word for "party" victory.

"I don't understand what they meant, Gran'sir," said she, as the two jogged homeward. "Didn't you vote against the saloon?"

"Yes, Mirandy! They pulled me one way and the other, tryin' to explain how things was, but I got hold of our minister, and says I, 'I want to vote agen the saloons, for our Willie would have been twenty-one if he'd lived, and I'm castin' his first ballot for him.' So then he read the ballots right straight for me, and I got 'em in—yes, I did! But now, don't you go for to tell Eri. Let's you and me have a secret."

"All right, so we will, Gran'sir," laughed Mrs. Saxton.

About sunset the bells began to ring. Mrs. Saxton heard them as she passed to and fro between house and barn doing the "chores"; and she looked skyward anxiously to see if there were signs of fire. But the only glow was that of the sun shining over the hill-tops after the storm. A neighbor was passing and of him she inquired:

"What are the church bells ringing for?"

"Why, Goshen's gone 'dry' for another year by one majority! Hooray!" he shouted.

Mrs. Saxton clasped her hands. She felt actually faint as she realized what that meant.

"Gran'sir," said she, hurrying into the kitchen, "the saloons are voted down once more, and your vote did it!"

"Thank the Lord!" ejaculated the old gentleman. "But I guess He knows it was Willie's vote, and Willie's mother's too."

Norwich, Conn.

BITS ABOUT UTAH—THE NEW CANDIDATE FOR STATEHOOD.

BY ELIZABETH CUMMINGS.

"Yas, sah, in Utah, sah," I heard our porter whisper, as I raised the shade. The sky was an intense luminous blue as if from afar it felt the sun. The train was following a mountain's side. Far below like a thread of silver was a river, beyond which rose a snowy range that melted away into the distance. Above those lofty heights hung the old moon, gibbous and golden. Utah, "a home among the mountains." How appropriate the name! When I again opened my eyes it was to behold orchards, dropping blossoms, lilacs full of purple plumes, daffodilly-edged walks, rows of buffalo currant bushes, yellow as gold, and stretching into the zenith the opalescent heights of the Wasatch mountains.

After breakfast we walked down one of the wide, poplar-shaded streets, and tried to realize that we were in Salt Lake City, and going to a Mormon Sunday-school.

Here tables on either side of the pulpit held baskets full of bread, and flagons of water and large cups. When a blind man, an officer, who seemed to be held in much respect, had made a brief prayer, other functionaries asked a blessing upon the bread and water, and the young men hastened to pass it to all present, even the tiniest, while the choir sang. Gentiles were of course omitted, and if any reverence was felt for the rite it was not apparent. Some of the Sunday-school hymns were from our collections, but many were from Mormon pens, and it was curious to read the imprecations and threatenings breathed out against "the enemies of Zion beyond the eastern mountains." No word of Scripture was read. I did not hear the name of the Redeemer spoken. After the communion, the young men and women separated, and filed down into separate apartments in the basement, where, I was told by friends who remained, they studied the book of Mormon for an hour.

At two o'clock we went to the wonderful tabernacle to hear a discourse by one of the chief speakers of the sect, Counselor C. W. Penrose. The venerable President Woodruff presided. The great organ towered up in two wings. At the left the women, at the right the men singers sat in wing-like galleries. In the center were the crimson-covered seats of the "apostles," and stretching just below them were two other wing-like spaces filled with men. This wing-like effect, suggesting the wings of the cherubim, must be intentional, and conveys something to these people.

The opening hymn made the Gentile part of the congregation gasp, for it was no less than "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord." Utah, and notably Salt Lake City, must produce an exceptional type of voice, for again, as in the Sunday-school, the singing was excellent, and given with an elan that would have carried any hymn, and made our old favorite doubly impressive; but in spite of the great number of singers, I heard no lovely, leading female voice, a notable want, since the female voice does not mature till the twenty-fifth year. The women's side seemed filled with very young women, while the men were of all ages. Perhaps at twenty-five the Mormon woman does not feel like singing.

Counselor Penrose said he had made no preparation for his address, but would rely entirely upon the Holy Spirit, and then he proceeded to an hour and a half of exposition of his creed, which was as remarkable for what it did not as for what it did say, for he did not mention the tenets which, clashing against the civil law, have brought upon the Mormons what they call persecution, punishment for polygamy and murder, or as they phrase it "blood atonement." "Our proper name," said he, "is the church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. We believe that in these days, in the nineteenth century, as in the times of old, God has revealed Himself, and that Jesus Christ has reëstablished His church in the manner in which He established it when He abode on earth in the flesh. We at the same time accord to all persons the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences and to build up their societies according to their best judgment. is about to prepare for the coming of Him whose right it is to reign. And as one of the signs preceding His advent, this gospel of the kingdom is being preached to all the world for a witness unto all nations before the end shall come. This is why we are willing to suffer all things, to endure all things for the gospel's sake. We are getting along to the time when we take joyfully the spoiling of our goods. It has been rather a hard thing to bear, but we are beginning to see the hand of God in it.

"We believe that religion is instituted by God, and that men are amenable to Him, and to Him only. We believe that all religious societies have a right to deal with their members for disorderly conduct, according to the rules and regulations of such societies, provided such dealings be for good fellowship and good standing. Now, while we claim these rights for ourselves, we extend like privileges to everybody else. We do not believe that governments, societies or institutions should interfere with religious freedom. People are not kept here by the power of man. They have turned their backs on their native lands, they have left the graves of their fathers, and have forsaken relatives and kindred to come up here, as the prophet said they would in the last days, into the tops of the mountains, where the house of the Lord is being reared in these last days, that they may learn of Him. 'But in the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the tops of the mountains, it shall be exalted above the hills, and people shall flow unto it.

"We believe that God, the Father, and Jesus Christ, his Son, appeared to Joseph Smith and opened to him the last dispensation, 'the fulness of times.' We believe that Peter, James and John came down and ordained him an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ, conferring upon him all keys, power and authority which they held while in the flesh. We believe that the same authority is in the priesthood to-day."

"In April, 1893, it will be forty years since that building was begun," said my companion, "and at that date great things are expected to happen. I have been told that the devout expect Brigham Young to return to earth, with Joseph Smith and the rest of the elect, and Salt Lake City, miraculously cleansed from Gentiles, to become the New Jerusalem of Scripture. I take it this is what Mr. Penrose refers to when he says this 'planet is to meet with a great change.'

"As for Mormon liberality toward people of different religious views, those of us who were here before the Gentiles got the upper hand, had enough of it. The improvements in this city have been made by the Gentiles. Before we were in the majority, there was no system of drainage, we had no street cars, and we carried lanterns when the nights were dark. It was not, and it is not Mormon policy to incite what we call public spirit. You have only to compare the Mormon public school with the one built by the Gentiles to be convinced. A quiet, humble-minded people who will pay tithes is what the Mormon leader desires. Tell about disciplining only for good standing and good fellowship! I have been told by men in positions to know, that Mormons who show symptoms of contumacy disappear, and as for punishing men in their property, the Walkers are a case in point. They did not pay what Brigham demanded to the church, and he 'speaking for the Lord of the people,' ordered them boycotted. The Gentiles flocked to their support and saved them."

"How about politics?" I asked.

"No one outside of Utah understands the situation as we do here. A Mormon is first a Mormon, and acts always in the interest of his church, which is knit together in a web even stronger than that which holds the Roman church. There is, you see, the same head, 'speaking for the Lord to the people,' and then there are 'the seventies,' of which watchful bodies there are eighty odd in Utah."

"And what makes the prosperity of Salt Lake City?"

"The mines. The state is full of gold, silver, lead and copper, not to mention other treasures. The smelting works down towards the lake keep the pockets of the saints well lined."

The next day I drove past the building set apart for plural wives by the blind generosity of the United States government. "No plural wife has ever entered it," said the lady whose guest I was. "I wonder if those men fancied one ever would!"

"Polygamy may be suspended, but you cannot change nature," said a Salt Lake City acquaintance. "I've been boarding with a Mormon family. The man married sisters, and the second wife lives on a farm in the country. The present law almost breaks her heart, and she comes in to see her husband twice a week. It is wearing her out that she has to come and stay with him secretly. She was brought up here, and, according to Mormon notions, he is her husband, poor thing."

Now, in the various arguments put forward against the admission of Utah to statehood, I note the peculiar tenet on which Mr. Penrose dwelt with such eloquence—the end of the world. I note objections to Mormon judges and juries, and Mormon legislatures, but nowhere do I see any word about a factor which must be reckoned with, if Utah should be permitted to slip into the Union behind the skirts of the territories she is grouped with in the bill to be presented to our next Congress—the plural wife. Unless she is of clay, quite different from that of which women are fashioned this side of the Rockies, she will be heard from the instant Utah obtains autonomy, and all this sad, heart-breaking business will have to be gone over again across the barriers the constitution has set about a state.

Reared to believe polygamy a part of a divine order, the plural wife of Utah wedded her husband with ceremonies; she bore his name, as also did her children, and she enjoyed the consideration of her co-religionists. She was a vital factor in building up Zion and her husband's earthly importance, and even more necessary to his making any appearance in the next world. It was not always possible for her to be quite supported, so she learned to be useful.

"I know an old fellow down the valley who had seven wives," said a Salt Lake City acquaintance, "and I have been told repeatedly that he used to hitch them up and plow with them." This may not be true, but if it is, I believe the seven felt no sense of degradation, for, upborne by a sense of duty, a woman is capable of doing a man's work, and even the work of a mule. When a man washes the dishes he pulls down the blinds and feels that he is doing a great thing for his Mary Ann, even if she be at that moment out washing to buy his dinner. The utter self-sacrifice and self-effacement for the family, which women accept in marriage, has been fully accepted by the plural wife of Utah, and it should be remembered that, as in monogamy, the man will receive all the woman can give. It is just here that the secret strength of polygamy has hidden—in the devotion of women to the family. But when in 1887 the law made secret marriages illegal, and declared that illegitimate children cannot inherit from their father, it struck at women who were, or who would become plural wives, and when it seized the property the Mormons had been hoarding under church charters, and the emigration funds, and made it hotter than ever for bigamous husbands, the men felt something had to be done. No wonder the Divine Command was suspended! But in that bull of suspension, the great primal difference in the sexes disclosed itself. If the plural wives of Utah had been offered crucifixion, or to cast such a shadow over husband and children as that act of suspension really is, I believe that to-day Utah would be white with crosses.

It has been said that the Democratic party looks with complacency upon statehood for Utah. We must then look to the South—that shed of its best blood in defense of the doctrine of state rights and which has shown a notable impatience with Mormon propagandists in her borders—for protection. If Republicans see any plums for them in Utah, let them remember Nauvoo, and that before it could be finally cleaned out and up, the legislature of Illinois had to repeal its charter, and that its cleaning up was due, not to a change in the Mormons, but to their exodus.

I have never seen any tendency among leopards to change their spots in my time, and Utah a state, with Mormon supremacy established over a region which is a perfect treasure-box, means the rehabilitation of the plural wife, if her love, her patience, her sufferings, or her children can touch the husband's heart. Let polygamy die as gentle and speedy a death as possible, and in these busy days, when Hawaii and the great Fair are claiming attention, "I beseech you to remember Utah." The[illegible] that spoke these words, recollect, were Mormon [illegible] Again, and I address myself especially to women, "I beseech you to remember Utah."

TEMPLE AFFAIRS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

(Concluded.)

Mr. Hobbs says, speaking of the subcommittee above alluded to, "they took legal advice first in Boston, then in Chicago. In both cities its legal advisers state the law as I have stated it." The gentleman has made another mistake; the counsel he speaks of in Boston was Mr. Francis S. Hasseltine, 10 Tremont street, and I have in my possession the decision he rendered to the committee, signed by his own hand. It reads as follows:

"To the Executive Committee of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union:

"In answer to the question submitted to me, as to whether the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is legally liable for the bonds issued by Matilda B. Carse, purporting to be in the behalf of the organization, I respectfully reply: I understand that the executive committee of the said National Woman's Christian Temperance Union have never by vote authorized the issuing of these bonds or have made themselves, by vote, liable therefor. A bond being submitted to me, I find that it does not purport to be or declare that it is a bond of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union; that it reads, 'I promise to pay,' and is signed Matilda B. Carse. Although it states before the said promise to pay that it is in behalf of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, it does not make it the obligation or promise of the union. And therefore, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is not liable on the said bond."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the question submitted to Mr. Hasseltine was in regard to the Temple Trust bonds only. This point was not submitted to Mr. Miller. Mr. Hobbs says: "The opinion of Mr. Miller was virtually suppressed." The circular sent out, containing his decision to the members of the Executive Committee, was very hurriedly gotten up; by inadvertence some things not correct were said in it prejudicial to the Temple, and the very thing which should have appeared in it, Mr. Miller's verbal opinion in regard to the formation of a board of trustees, was not added to his written opinion nor mentioned by the committee. The circular, therefore, was fitted only to mislead rather than to throw light upon the great enterprise.

The chairman of the committee, Mrs. Dunham, as soon as she realized the mistake which they had made, sent out postals to the Executive Committee asking that they suspend judgment until they heard from the committee again. The Board of Temple Trustees was at once formed, which, in Mr. Miller's opinion, would obviate all the difficulty in the matter.

Mr. Hobbs indulges in his article in a long tirade of my management of Temple affairs. He does not stop at this, but insinuates that I have received money which I have not passed over to the treasurer, Miss Pugh. In one place he says: "Her accounts (the treasurer's) show that the fund has amounted to $85,000, though it is said Mrs. Carse claims it has touched $100,000. A good many people would like to know what has become of that gift fund. If it amounts to $100,000, what has become of the $15,000, if Miss Pugh has not received it? And where has it ever been publicly acknowledged?" I never made such a statement, and he has no grounds for making such a charge. Would Mr. Hobbs have dared make such an assertion, without the slightest proof, had I been a man?

The last public statement I made in regard to the amount received from the gift fund is to be found in my annual report, 1892, delivered at Denver, from which Mr. Hobbs in another part of his article quotes the receipts from the gift fund up to October, 1892, were $77,618. The manner in which the money received has been applied will be seen by Miss Pugh's, the treasurer, report.

In this report Miss Pugh has included $5,000 received from Mrs. T. W. Palmer, of Detroit, for $5,000 worth of Temple stock, which was afterwards exchanged for Temple Trust bonds. This $5,000 is included in the item of stock purchased for N. W. C. T. U. ($61,759.71), which, owing to the transfer mentioned, reduces this amount to $56,759.71.

The amounts reported as being received for busts are entirely independent of the gift fund and were the individual subscriptions of friends and sent to Miss Pugh for disbursement.

Therefore, deducting these items, the actual amount received for the gift fund was $85,677.64.

This will answer Mr. Hobbs' questions in regard to the disposition of the gift fund. A word, however, in reply to his anxious inquiries in regard to the $15,000 received from Miss Pugh in two checks. The indorsements on the back of those checks show what the money was used for.

Check No. 31, Metropolitan Bank, order Mrs. M. B. Carse, $5,000. Indorsed, "Pay to the order of H. C. Speer. M. B. Carse. For deposit to credit of H. C. Speer."

Check No. 90 on Metropolitan National Bank, order of Mrs. M. B. Carse, $10,259.71. Indorsed, "Pay to the order of Marshall Field. Mrs. M. B. Carse." "Pay Marshall Field & Co. Marshall Field." Stamped, Marshall Field & Co.

This money was paid for stock as can be seen by Miss Pugh's statement.

"I would like to know," says Mr. Hobbs, "what particular stock has been pledged at the American Trust and Savings Bank for the payment of Mrs. Carse's $300,000 Temple Trust bonds? Is it possible she used the $54,000 worth of stock bought with the gift fund for this purpose?" Most assuredly I did, and the dear women and children with their little gifts, many of them secured through great self-sacrifice, over which Mr. Hobbs wails but I rejoice, helped all they could and knew all about it through the weekly Temple column in THE UNION SIGNAL. Now, does Mr. Hobbs suppose the Temple Trust bonds could have been issued for the purpose of raising money to buy up the stock for the National W. C. T. U. unless the gift money had been used? Mr. Hobbs also objects to having $9,500 paid out for the marble tablets and decorations of Willard Hall. This had been stipulated for five years with those who have contributed to the gift fund and they have known all about it.

The Board of Trustees, January, 1892, voted $10,000 for the decoration of the hall. "Willard Hall," says Mr. Hobbs, "belongs to the Building Association, and has been rented to the Central W. C. T. U., so the Central W. C. T. U. should have finished and decorated it." As the gentleman very well knows, all tenants of banks and other offices in buildings always add all extra decorations themselves. It could not be expected the Building Association would furnish the hall with marble tablets, and other symbolical decorations. In regard to the Chicago W. C. T. U. having rented the hall, they have not yet done so, and if they had, they certainly are not the ones to put in such decorations. However, the Temple trustees, consisting of thirteen ladies in the National W. C. T. U., headed by Frances E. Willard, Lady Henry Somerset, and six state presidents, concurred in the opinion that the hall should be finished with the money from the gift fund. Under the circumstances their judgment in the matter should have some weight.

Mr. Hobbs charges me with usurping the trusteeship of the Temple fund; he says: "It is perfectly evident the trustee of that fund is Miss Pugh." This is like all the other assertions of the gentleman, entirely untenable. At my request, as an individual, but for and on behalf of the National W. C. T. U., Miss Pugh consented to act as treasurer of the gift fund, of which I was then trustee. Her duties were to receive the money, publish its receipts and pay it out on my order. When the board of trustees was selected over a year ago, she accepted the trusteeship under its election. All official requirements were met before she was asked to pay out any money. She was not elected a member of the board of trustees, only its treasurer.

Another reckless assertion of Mr. Hobbs is that he has seen Temple stock quoted at 55, which is a pure fabrication. Mr. Henry Dibblee, vice-president of the Temple Building Association, replies to his assertion as follows: "When Mr. Hobbs says that stock in this Temple concern was quoted at 55 cents on the dollar, he simply talks about something of which he knows absolutely nothing, and if he would only take the trouble to inquire, he would find out that, on the contrary, this stock has never been listed. It has never been dealt in on exchange, and has never been on any market. Every original holder paid par for stock."

Mr. Hobbs demands that I answer the following questions, which, for the sake of friends of the cause I cheerfully do:

1. Who appointed you trustee of the gift fund? My appeal for money for a National W. C. T. U. building, which first appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL of August, 1887, and which brought a hearty response, constituted me trustee of the fund in fact, if not by legal appointment. Besides, I was appointed Temple superintendent at the National W. C. T. U. Convention, Nashville, Tenn., in 1887.

2. How much does the gift fund amount to? It amounts, March 12, 1893, to $86,220.14 in cash.

3. How much of it was sent directly to you, and how much to Miss Pugh; and have you turned over to Miss Pugh all that you have received? It is impossible for me to say how much was sent directly to me, as it was passed over immediately to Miss Pugh, the treasurer. In my weekly column of Temple Items in THE UNION SIGNAL I always inserted this clause: "All drafts should be made payable to Esther Pugh, the treasurer." Every cent I have received in gifts I have paid into the hands of the treasurer, and all moneys received have been published, with the name of the donor, in THE UNION SIGNAL.

5. Furnish an itemized list of all the contributions that have been sent to you? They can be found in the files of THE UNION SIGNAL, commencing August, 1887, and can be seen at THE UNION SIGNAL office in the Temple. The treasurer is the proper person to give this information. Ten shares, or one thousand dollars worth of Temple stock was sent me from Mr. Ferdinand Schumacker, of Akron, Ohio. I exchanged it at once for a Temple Trust bond, and made a note of it, both in my last annual report and also in the "Temple Item" column in THE UNION SIGNAL, November 10, 1892. I also received the deed of some lots for the Temple, in Rowland, Alabama, from Mr. John T. Tanner, which was acknowledged in THE UNION SIGNAL, August 25, 1887, and also in my annual report of the same year. I have also received a deed of some lots near Chicago, from Rev. Watson Tranter and his wife, which I acknowledged in THE UNION SIGNAL, February 12, 1893. I also acknowledged at the same time the gift of one share of stock in the Temple from Mrs. Emily Smith, West Haven, Conn.

5. Have you publicly acknowledged receipt of them, and if so of which? The answer to the question above will cover this one.

6. Give an itemized account of the way the gift fund, or any of it, has been expended? The treasurer's report, which accompanies this article, states how the money was expended. The loss noted in her account by the failure of Kean's bank, of $2,109.22, was due to the treasurer returning it to the bank after she had been instructed by me to withdraw it, and had withdrawn it, on account of the shaky condition of the concern.

7. Was the issue of the Temple Trust bonds and the purchase of Field's stock a private enterprise, or did you undertake it as a trustee of the National W. C. T. U.?

8. Did the National W. C. T. U. ever give you authority to do this?

9. Why did you advertise the bonds as "for the National W. C. T. U."? Questions 7, 8 and 9 are so closely allied to each other I will answer them as one. The issue of Temple Trust bonds has no more to do with the purchase of Mr. Field's stock than that of any other person. The bonds had been issued and many of them sold before the contract was made with Mr. Field to purchase his entire stock. The issuing of the bonds could not be classed quite as a private enterprise, as it was "for and on behalf of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union," as stated on the face of the bond. That they were issued by a private individual is true, as specified on the back of the bond, which reads: "Matilda B. Carse, of Chicago, as an individual, but for and on behalf of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and for its sole benefit, has acquired $100 of the stock of the Woman's Temperance Building Association of the city of Chicago, an organization duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois, and has caused a certificate of stock in said amount to be issued in the name of the American Trust and Savings Bank, trustee, to be held by the said trustee as security for this Temple Trust bond." As stated above, I issued the bonds as an individual because the National W. C. T. U. did not wish to be held financially responsible, but desired me to proceed as an individual. In this way the gain was all theirs, the risk all mine.

10. How much was paid Mr. Field for his stock, and how much of the purchase money, if any, came from the gift fund? Mr. Field was paid par and five per cent interest from the time his money was first invested, the same as all original stockholders were promised, if they would hold their stock until it could be purchased for the W. C. T. U. Fifteen thousand dollars of the money paid to Mr. Field came from the gift fund.

11. Give an itemized statement of the expenses incurred in selling the bonds, and tell out of what fund or funds these expenses were defrayed? It is impossible to make an "itemized" statement of such expenses in such an article. Suffice to say, all expenditures for this account have been accounted for in every item by the financial agent, as Mr. Speer's statement of sales account shows:

Receipts $300,000 for bonds at par and interest	$303,765.78
Expense and commission acct., deducted	10,082.04
Net proceeds of bonds	$293,683.74

12. What certificates of stock are pledged for the Temple trust bonds? Give the names of the owners? Marshall Field, Norman B. Ream, L. A. Hagans, Samuel W. Packard, H. W. Austin, Ferdinand Schumacker, E. S. Converse, E. H. Clapp, James B. Potter, J. C. Stevens, Wm. Grover, Thomas Kane, Mrs. Burkhalter, Mrs. H. W. Bailey, Mrs. T. W. Palmer, Matilda B. Carse (representing the gift fund).

13. In whose name did you subscribe for the stock in the Building Association that was paid for out of the gift fund? In the name of Matilda B. Carse.

14. Has this stock ever been transferred or reissued, and if so, when, how and to whom? This stock has been transferred at various times to the American Trust and Savings Bank, trustee, to be held as collateral for the Temple Trust bonds.

15. When Mr. Field was paid for his stock, to whom was it transferred or reissued, and who owns it now, and how? It was transferred and reissued to Matilda B. Carse, and by her transferred to the American Trust and Savings Bank to be held as collateral for Temple Trust bonds.

16. By whose authority was the Board of Temple Trustees appointed; and who gave the board the right to hold the Temple property for twenty-one years; and why have you not transferred to this board the Field stock and all of the stock that you have bought for the National W. C. T. U.? By my own authority, under the advice of attorney H. H. C. Miller. All stock held by me for the National W. C. T. U. up to $300,000 had to be placed in trust in the American Trust and Savings Bank as collateral to the $300,000 Temple Trust bonds issued. The balance of the stock over and above this amount is now held by the newly appointed treasurer of the Temple Trustees, Mr. W. D. Preston, cashier of the Metropolitan National Bank, Chicago.

How do you make out that you now control for the National W. C. T. U. $350,000 worth of stock in the Building Association? I said in my annual report last October that by February 1, "We will then hold the controlling interest of the stock—$301,000 would give us this—but we will have, by that time, somewhere about $350,000," and no doubt we would, if the persistent enmity of the parties whose attack I am now answering, which has followed close upon the heels of this enterprise since its first inception, had not cast its malign influence on every plan I originated.

To properly answer the remaining charges and insinuations made by Mr. Hobbs, it will be necessary for me to give a short review of the Temple since its first inception. In 1879 I became deeply impressed with the conviction that if the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was to be successful, it must have a weekly organ of its own and its own publishing house. This met with Miss Willard's approval, and I had a company incorporated, with a capital stock of $5,000, which has since been increased to $125,000. In January, 1880, the first number of THE UNION SIGNAL was published, and the paper and publishing house proved, as had been anticipated, a great aid in developing the organization.

I felt that the next crying need of the society was an income. Miss Willard, our matchless leader, had planned with the assistance of other broad-minded women a marvelous campaign for the protection of our homes and children against the inroads of the saloon. It contemplated over forty lines of work. Capable and noble women were placed in charge of the different departments, but they were immediately handicapped for lack of funds, the National treasury not being able even to meet their postage bills, or pay their president a salary for her splendid services. About 1884 I began planning for a National building that would be a source of revenue to the society. I saw men combine in stock companies to erect buildings for profit, and they had been successful. Why could not the same be done for a philanthropic purpose? If we could only find men large-hearted enough to subscribe for the stock and give us an option on it for twelve years—by the payment to them of five per cent for the use of their money—the thing, I felt assured, could be done. Our society numbered 200,000 with about 10,000 auxiliary unions; besides we had our own organ, THE UNION SIGNAL, to use as a medium to interest the women in such an undertaking. I felt that with their assistance, and that of the friends of the cause, with the additional help of the rentals, in a dozen years the National society would be entire owners of the property. In order to make the building a thoroughly National one, in which all states would have a joint interest, we promised, when it was all paid for, one half of the income should go to the National society, and the other half to the states, pro rata the amount each state had paid towards the building fund.

For four years the heaven-born impression grew upon me that I was called to undertake the work. I consulted architects, real estate men and builders, and made myself familiar with all the details of great buildings. I consulted with Miss Willard, and she was enthusiastic over it, if the plan could be carried out. She asked Mr. Hobbs and Miss Pugh to be incorporators, and I secured Mr. Wm. Deering, in addition to these Miss Willard and myself.

The Woman's Temperance Building Association was incorporated July 13, 1887. Miss Willard wrote the first article that ever appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL in regard to it July 28, 1887. In this letter she made an appeal for money for the building, and in the same paper, August 11, Miss Willard and myself made a joint appeal with our signatures attached, as committee. The plan was presented to the National Convention for its indorsement in November, 1887. Miss Willard, in her last annual report, speaks of it as follows: "Well do I remember the scene in the Cumberland Presbyterian church, Nashville, Tenn., when, in the Convention of 1887, Mrs. Matilda B. Carse stood forward and gave us an account of what she believed women could do, if they would arise and build a beautiful temple, which should be a source of revenue to the society, besides furnishing it with attractive headquarters of its own, and a hall for gospel temperance meetings. Never has a greater enthusiasm been awakened in our National Convention, and subscriptions were then and there made, representing nearly every state in the Union."

All this enthusiasm was much cooled, when the following resolution was read before the convention and opposed by the wife of a prominent Prohibitionist and wealthy Chicago citizen, Mrs. J. B. Hobbs:

"Resolved, That we cordially indorse the plan of the Temperance Temple as presented by its founder, and pledge to this great enterprise our hearty coöperation with money and influence."

On occount of Mrs. Hobbs' opposition, the resolution was referred to the Executive committee, and Mrs. Hobbs and myself appeared before it. She claimed that it was considered by her husband and others a ruinous thing to build on leased ground, no matter if the title was perpetual, and besides this there were too many office buildings in Chicago; that there were then eleven acres of unrented offices around the Board of Trade. After my reply to her argument, the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That we regard with admiration and amazement the colossal plans of our earnest and devoted sister, Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, of Chicago, for the building of a Temperance Temple in that city, as a home and source of financial revenue to the National W. C. T. U.; that we do give to Mrs. Carse our sympathy, our prayers, and pledge ourselves not to hinder or embarrass her in the prosecution of her plans—provided she shall legally obligate herself not to begin the work until $500,000 shall be secured."

The above actions will be found in the National Minutes, National Convention 1887, pages 39, 41, 45 and 58. This is the resolution Mr. Hobbs boasts I was defeated in at the Nashville Convention,—and I was appointed superintendent of Temple work. In this way the first seeds of mistrust were sown in the minds of the W. C. T. U. women.

In order to allay fears, after my return from the convention, I addressed a circular letter to the following well-known business men of Chicago: Messrs. Lyman J. Gage, William E. Hale, Ferd. W. Peck, William N. Brand and W. R. Nixon, laying before them my plan and asking their opinion, putting special stress on erecting a building on leased ground. Every answer was favorable, if I could succeed in placing the stock. (These letters can be found in the files of THE UNION SIGNAL for December 22 and 29, 1887.) I also published them as a circular letter and sent out to the timid ones.

Mr. Hobbs charges me with never publishing but one side of the Temple affairs. This is entirely unwarranted as the files of THE UNION SIGNAL will prove. The first objections to the plan I published in that paper December 22, 1887. All objections, however, had their start from Mr. Hobbs and his wife, the latter opposing the project at every National Convention, and going before the Executive committee to argue against it. The following resolution was presented in the Convention by the resolution committee: (Page 59 of the annual minutes of the New York convention, held October, 1888.)

"WHEREAS, We believe the Temperance Temple as National headquarters and as a source of permanent revenue to both the National and state unions as an enterprise worthy of our great society:

"Resolved, That this convention express its hearty indorsement of the undertaking, and that states pledge their active coöperation to Mrs. M. B. Carse, who is devoting life and strength to this achievement."

Mrs. Hobbs again made a severe attack on the Temple project on the floor of the Convention, and the resolution was referred to the Executive committee, before whom I had to appear. The substance of the resolution was passed: "That we pledge our organized effort for the Temple." (Page 67, National Minutes.)

Mr. Hobbs says I tried to secure the indorsement of the Temple Trust bond scheme at the New York Convention, and failed. I never even dreamed of issuing bonds at that time, so I could not have presented it. The Executive committee at the New York Convention appointed what is known as a committee on the Affiliated Interests of the society, which embraced the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, the Temperance Hospital and the Temple. This committee was to look thoroughly into the management of these interests, and report the condition they found them in at the next annual convention. Mrs. Helen M. Barker, then president of the South Dakota W. C. T. U., was appointed chairman of the committee. At the annual convention, held in Chicago in 1889, the committee reported in regard to the Temple as follows:

"After a careful examination of everything connected with the Temple enterprise which legitimately comes within our province, we do not hesitate to give the enterprise our unqualified approval. The investment of the money, as soon as received, in securities approved by our National treasurer, Miss Pugh, is a wise measure, and secures our confidence in the wisdom of the management, albeit the chief factor is a woman. If a man had conceived the idea and proceeded to lay plans, financial and otherwise, and if in the process of time the magnificent structure should have, story by story, risen to successful completion, our plaudits of encouragement would have been loud and long. Can we not be as generous toward one of our own sex, who, as a financier, has already proved herself equal to emergencies? Your committee believes you will, and by an increased confidence and more earnest effort, will help forward this magnificent project adopted by the Executive committee." (Pages 77 and 78 National Minutes, 1889.)

At the Convention held at Atlanta, Ga., November, 1890, Mrs. J. H. Jones, chairman of committee on Affiliated Interests, reported the status of the Temple with receipts and expenses. (Pages 80 and 81 of the National Minutes.)

The unrelenting opposition to the Temple project, by the persons I have alluded to, and two or three others high in official position in the W. C. T. U., with such a following as they could influence, I saw was going to defeat my plan for paying for all of the $61,000 worth of stock for which I had subscribed for the National W. C. T. U. The corner-stone of the Temple was laid in November, 1890, and as the building was going forward it was necessary to meet the assessments. I got Mrs. T. W. Palmer, of Detroit, to take $5,000 worth of the stock for which I had subscribed, Mrs. L. A. Burkhalter, of Iowa, $1,000, and H. W. Bailey, of Maine, $500. After the building was fairly begun, the opposition, who had declared that I could never place all the stock, gave this cry up, as they had the one in regard to the leased ground, and started on another track. They admitted it is a splendid piece of property, but said the stockholders would never allow the W. C. T. U. to own it. I got a book and secured the signatures of a large number of stockholders that they would sell their stock within six months, if I desired. The next point was to get money to pay for it. It was at this time I decided to issue $300,000 worth of six per cent ten year collateral Temple Trust bonds.

I reasoned that it was only one per cent more than we had to pay the stockholders for the use of their money. If we could only hold the controlling interest in the stock there certainly could be no more objections urged against the enterprise, and as soon as the building began to pay a dividend, part of it could be applied to paying the interest on the bonds. In the meantime, the interest could be paid from the gift fund. This gained, the satisfactory condition of the whole enterprise would give such confidence to the public that the rich and noble-hearted would, when applied to, give generously to enable us to pay off the entire indebtedness on the building.

In order to issue W. C. T. U. bonds it was necessary that I should be legally authorized by the National W. C. T. U. to act as their trustee. I prepared a circular letter for the National Executive Committee, asking that they empower me to act as their trustee for the Temple. These letters I sent to Miss Willard, who was then in Canada, explaining to her why I wanted the authority, and requesting, if the plan met with her approval, that she would send word to the Executive committee. This is the document Mr. Hobbs speaks of, when he says: "The answers came immediately, sure enough, Miss Willard sending hers by telegraph, but these were all flat refusals to sign the circular, and some of them contained very pointed warnings to let the bond scheme alone. It was under these circumstances that Mrs. Carse then proceeded to issue the Temple Trust bonds, in apparent defiance of the National W. C. T. U." This is like all the other assertions of this gentleman, very wide of the mark.

Miss Willard, in her trip to Canada, was accompanied by Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Portland, Me., assistant recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U. Miss Willard sent no telegram in answer to my letter, but had Mrs. Stevens write me. The following is a copy of the letter:

"ST. JOHNS, N. B., June 23, 1891.

"DEAR MRS. CARSE:—Miss Willard has told me of the step you now wish to take in the interest of the Temple. She feels bad that she cannot see her way clearly to sign the document as you wish. I have no idea that the Executive committee will favor it, and I would advise you not to wait to get any expression from them. You always have gone on and acted independently of them, so far as financial responsibility is concerned. Why not now do what you think best to raise the money?"

Miss Willard also wrote a few tender lines regretting that she could not sign. These are the only letters I received on the subject, as the circular letter I had prepared was never sent out to the Executive. I found, therefore, that the only way bonds could be issued was for me to assume them as a personal matter. This, as the lawyer very plainly told me, meant staking my own private fortune on the bonds. I had placed my life upon the altar of humanity. My little fortune was but a small consideration, so I ordered the bonds issued. They were secured by an equal amount of paid up stock. Mr. H. C. Speer, 237 La Salle street, Chicago, negotiated the bonds. The entire $300,000 worth was closed out February 1, 1893. The interest upon them will be met as I have stated above. At the Boston Convention, November, 1891, the following resolution was passed. (Page 74, National Minutes.)

"Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to use our powers and influence to sell the Temple bonds that have been issued by Mrs. Carse."

When I executed the bond deal, I had a lawyer draw up a document stating the manner in which I hold the stock and bonds for the benefit of the Temple, so that in case of my death there would be no misunderstanding, and my heirs were instructed to deliver the property over to the National W. C. T. U. Mr. Hobbs copies a portion of this document in his article, and in the most cruel manner pretends to misunderstand it, and draws entirely wrong conclusions from it.

The following resolution was also adopted:

"Resolved, That the state presidents be requested to set at work systematically to raise funds for the Temple, asking every local union of thirty members or more to contribute $100 by means of mite-boxes, or otherwise, as they choose." (Page 52, National Minutes.)

At the Boston Convention Mrs. Hobbs again bitterly assailed the Temple enterprise; this caused the Executive Committee to pass the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee, consisting of Mrs. Dunham, Mrs. Woodbridge and Mrs. Lathrap, be appointed to carefully investigate the Temple interests, to report to the General Officers and to each state president not later than four weeks from this date." (Page 74, National Minutes.)

The action of this committee I have already given; the formation of the Board of Temple Trustees followed this meeting, also the contract with Mr. Field to purchase his entire block of stock.

The Temple enterprise was now going on very successfully. Miss Willard said in her annual report at Denver: "The Temple is the most beautiful office building in the world; this fact has already passed into a proverb, and is as freely conceded in London and Paris as it is freely claimed in the Electric City of the West.

"The building does not yet belong to us in fee simple, nor did we in the least expect that it could so belong when we resolved, five years ago, it should be built, but everything looks hopeful. The stock is already controlled by us, and we have ten years in which to raise the money, which will enable us to call this splendid edifice all our own. No office building has ever been more popular among business men, or rented more readily in its first year. We rejoice that this wonderful monument, the greatest in the world, of woman's perseverance, faith and courage, stands on one of the most notable streets in Chicago—the great monument of the modern temperance reform, the mile-post of the century and philanthropy."

This is the building Mr. Hobbs calls "a vain-glorious pile." When I went to the Denver Convention, in October last, I was not prepared for the storm that there swept over me in regard to the Temple from the source I have so often before mentioned. I had, however, the Board of Trustees to stand by me. They knew the accusations made were false, and the following resolution was passed with great enthusiasm in open convention:

"WHEREAS, the financial standing of the Temple has never before been so secure and the outlook so hopeful as now, the report given and accepted here showing that by united effort we can within one year hold a controlling amount of Temple stock, therefore, resolved:

"That we will not cast doubt upon this enterprise; that we will not create distrust; that if any cannot help they shall at least allow those who will do so peace of mind in the doing. Further resolved:

"That it is the sense of this convention that for the sake of the W. C. T. U. and the great work to which it is pledged, and for the sake of the cause of woman's advancement in the world, there is but one just and reasonable course to pursue—that we stand with solid front and united effort until we reach the successful and triumphant completion of this great enterprise; and to this end we urge special and persistent effort for the Temple during this our Columbian year." (Denver National Minutes, pages 59 and 60.)

It would have been thought after this action and the satisfactory condition of the enterprise, the opposition would subside, but instead of this my life since the Denver convention was made miserable and my health began to be undermined by persecutions into which I will not enter.

Mr. Hobbs may find some satisfaction in having his "interview" used by hostile parties, in charge of some paper, assailing the Temple enterprise as a "monstrous fraud upon the Christian women of the United States." This characterization was prefaced by the following: "Mr. Hobbs has ordered a number of these papers for distribution. Send for a copy of the Tribune to Mr. Hobbs, at the Chamber of Commerce, Chicago." Is Mr. Hobbs now satisfied? The Sentinel, Toledo, Ohio, in its W. C. T. U. department, has the following: "A Mr. Hobbs, of Chicago, has seen fit to attack the management of the Temperance Temple at this late day. He chose, too, as his time when Mrs. Carse has gone to California, seeking restoration from a severe illness. He makes many assertions and asks various questions in a five column article in the Chicago Tribune. The paper is being sent to local presidents all over the country, with a view to stampeding the forces."

Immediately after the National Convention at Denver, and before Miss Willard and Lady Somerset left for England, a Temple Trustee meeting was held. One important matter was decided; that the services of the Rev. Watson Tranter should be secured as financial agent for the Temple to raise, if possible, $300,000 by June, 1893, the time that had been set for the formal dedication of the building. No effort had before been made to secure subscriptions for the enterprise, except through the column which I weekly write in THE UNION SIGNAL. Our plan, which appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL, January 12, 1893, was that Mr. Tranter should go to rich men and secure subscriptions. It was at this time we called a meeting of a few leading business men, lawyers and clergy, when the much talked of paper of indorsement was signed about which I have explained. The following extract I take from my own column in THE UNION SIGNAL, of February 2, 1893:

"In order to have our financial agent, Rev. Watson Tranter, fully equipped for his great undertaking of raising the entire indebtedness on the Temple, and also for the purpose of silencing the foolish slanders that have been circulated in regard to its financial standing, by those who should have been its strongest supporters"—and the article goes on to state fully in regard to the meeting and the paper of indorsement.

Mr. Hobbs has very seriously criticised my personal reports, calling them superficial, and that I did not give a statement of receipts and expenses. I was not the person to do this. It was the duty of the treasurer, Miss Pugh, who received all the money and paid it out, and in her annual reports to the National W. C. T. U. it can be found. Mr. Hobbs claims that Miss Pugh did not know when she paid money on my order what it was for; this is another one of his mistakes. I always told Miss Pugh what the money was for.

Mr. Hobbs says: "The National Association is in danger of becoming honeycombed with feuds and dissensions over matters of finance, so that it is a question whether ten years from now there will be any National W. C. T. U. to hold the property. I have never been aware of any feuds and dissensions over matters of finance until they were started by the gentleman who makes the above assertion.

In view of this whole matter I ask a fair-minded public: What is the animus of these relentless attacks year after year upon a great enterprise that is for the furtherance of a noble and holy cause? Is it because I have asked the members of the W. C. T. U. to give a penny a day for a year in the mite-boxes I have sent out for the Temple? Many of them have done this with much self-denial, but self-denial is one of the cardinal virtues of the white ribbon women, and we do all possible to foster it. They do not complain. They delight to deny themselves a little for the beautiful Temple.

Is it because the bondholders are in danger of losing their money? If they are they have made no sign, and thousands of dollars have been invested in the bonds in Chicago. They are perfectly satisfied with the security, and not one of them, I am sure, will exchange a Temple Trust bond for a government bond.

Is it for the peace of the W. C. T. U.? Is it for the suppression of intemperance? Is it for the credit of the cause? Is it in interest of fair play? Why has my name been bandied about for the last four weeks in the papers as though a woman's character was of no account? Why did Mr. Hobbs buy a large issue of the paper in which his article of the 25 ult. appeared and send it broadcast over the land? Why does he follow Mr. Tranter wherever he has applied for money for the Temple with his untruthful attack?

Who is behind the cruel and untruthful articles about myself, the Temple and other things in which I am engaged, which have appeared in a certain Chicago evening paper for eight consecutive nights? Not a bank in this land, however strong, but would have to close its doors, if it had been assailed as the Temple enterprise has been.

Is it manly to try and rob the women of the W. C. T. U. of their beautiful Temple, that is so dear to their hearts, because a woman happens to be the chief factor in its erection?

I request, in the interest of fair play, that all religious and secular papers throughout the country that read this article will publish it, as neither myself nor the gift fund of the Temple can afford to buy a large edition of this paper to send out, as my accuser did of his article.

In conclusion, I beg to say that Mr. Hobbs does not deserve the work and worry incident to this answer. I am answering only for the benefit of a great public, whose fears he may have causelessly excited to the detriment of this enterprise, and to whose continued confidence the Temple Trustees appeal without fear of the final result.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The temperance and prohibition movement has entered upon a new phase in England within the past week. Those who, like myself, were privileged to be in the gallery of our House of Commons, on Monday, February 27, had the gladness of seeing our great and good cause lifted, there and then, to a higher level and placed in a more influential position than ever it had occupied before.

The occasion was unique in the history of this country, for it was one in which a leading member of the national cabinet, Sir William Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed, not for himself alone, but in the name of the responsible government, a bill, the like of which was never before prepared by a government of England. It was a bill "to establish local control over the traffic in liquor." That is its title, but it means much more than the recited title implies, for the main principle of the bill is to enable the rate-payers in limited areas—parishes—to prohibit the liquor traffic.

Prohibitionists in this country have not been thought by some to be very practical people. But they have kept "pegging away," as your immortal Lincoln had it, added precept upon precept, fact to fact, argument to argument, and kept steadily in view in the great mass of temperance work, the great ultimate as aim and goal—prohibition. The liquor traffic affects to think itself entrenched in custom and relies for safety on its boast of three hundred and fifty years establishment. But liquordom received a rude shock, as the temperance party did sensations of delight as the Chancellor of the Exchequer expounded his bill. No more important temperance meeting was ever held than filled St. Stephen's last Monday week. The principles enunciated by Sir William Harcourt were those of the temperance movement, and his arguments might have graced the platform of the United Kingdom Alliance, as he stood for the right of the people to say to the liquor traffic, "You shall not exist here."

A full generation of temperance reformers has pleaded for just such powers as are proposed in this government bill, and it was a great day for temperance reform in this land when Her Majesty's government espoused the chief principle of that reform. They have not done this of their own unaided volition. Previous letters in THE UNION SIGNAL on our late general election have set forth the influences brought to bear by the temperance party, on politicians, on Parliament and on government. Therefore, the government, in introducing its Direct Veto Bill, is but obeying the behest of the best among our people, and fulfilling one of the highest of the pledges by which the government and the party which gives it life and power, attained at the hands of the people to the place it occupies at the head of the nation's affairs.

Thus do temperance reformers reap to-day somewhat of the harvest they have long so toilfully sown, and thus are they amply justified of their principles and of the insistence with which they have pressed them alike on the public mind and on the law-makers of the day. No greater justification, indeed, could be found, for it is no mean thing that a government of such a nation, responsible for the well-being of forty millions of people, should take over and make its own in prospective legislation the great underlying principle of temperance reform—that of prohibition.

This old country moves slowly in all reforms, but it moves surely, and this reform can never be degraded from its present position. If the Government Bill passes its law—and there is good ground for hope that it may—then for the first time will our temperance people be able to come to close quarters with their enemy, the liquor traffic, and be so equipped for the fray as to enter the lists on terms of equality and fairness. This will be by means of the power of a Direct Veto which the bill accords to the voters, including women rate-payers—a specially gratifying point—enabling them in their parishes to prohibit liquor-selling.

The liquor sellers, on the other hand, are at no loss to appraise the significance of the bill. They fear nothing so much as the giving of power to the people to suppress drink-selling. They know that means that in a good many places they will be suppressed at the first opportunity. So they offer to this bill all the resistance of which they are capable. It is mostly sound and fury, however, and will probably not come to much. The real fight in Parliament will be on the question of compensation, but the country has settled that question long ago, adversely to the liquor party, and is no wise likely to go back upon the record in that matter.

In the meantime the temperance party will meet agitation with agitation, and we are in for a spell—it may be short and sharp—of public propaganda, such as has not been seen in temperance work for some time past. No measure of recent years has excited so much public interest, probably not even excepting the Home Rule Bill now being discussed. The reception of the bill by the newspaper press has been much more favorable than might have been expected, so much more is the world ready to believe in a principle when a government has first been converted to it. There are of course some, both writers and speakers, who profess not to believe the bill is meant to pass, but these people greatly underestimate the power and influence in the country and the temperance party and it will be no fault of the latter if, having brought their work to such a position, they fail in the near future to reap legislative fruit of their toil.

MAKE CHILDHOOD HAPPY.

BY ANNA M. LLEWELLYN.

Some day the little face so round and fair,
Will be lined by many a care;
Some day the little feet so free and gay,
Will find obstructions in their way;
Then smooth the path,
Speak not in wrath;
Make childhood happy.

Some day the little child will tempted be,
And sinful ways too soon will see.
Some day the little hands, so full of life,
Will be lured surely into strife;
Then guide aright,
Live in His sight,
Make childhood happy.

Oh, mother dear, this gift of thine
Was given thee by one divine.
Some day He'll ask: "What hast thou done
To train for Me thy little one?"
Then, wisdom found,
Let grace abound;
Make childhood happy.

THE REVOLT OF HANNAH DRUDGE.

BY LYDIA HOYT FARMER.

Author of "A Knight of Faith," "A Moral Inheritance," "A Short History of the French Revolution," "Famous Rulers, and Queens," "The Life of La Fayette," etc.

"'Tain't that I'm not willin' to work," soliloquized Hannah Drudge to herself, as she scrubbed her kitchen floor after her Saturday's baking was finished; "there's not a lazy bone in my body," she murmured, throwing the energy of her thought into the muscles of her arms, the result being the cleanest, whitest floor in the village of Dulltown.

"I never did spare elbow grease in doin' my chores, anyhow!" she proudly added, "but,"—and the accustomed gray, tired look settled on her face, "a worm trod on too hard will turn at last. Other folks git some rest in their lives. I reckon I warn't turned out so mighty different in the first place from other folks' natur' as to be ordained by the Almighty for a perpetual workin' machine, instid of a human creatur' with some sort of a soul in one's body.

"Elder Berry talks very exhortin' about cultivatin' one's spiritual natur', and Brother Ebenezer jines in with edifyin' amens, and 'Yes, Lord'! but how is a household drudge ever to git time to cultivate her soul unless she's so powerful built as to be able to scrub kitchen floors, and bake pies, and scour pans and kittles, and darn socks, and polish stoves, and wash dishes, and bile soap, and cook for the farm hands, and milk the cows, and churn the butter, and make apple sass, and do the family wash, and keep her spirits all the time sot on things eternal, and her mind contemplatin' white-robed angels, twangin' harps on cloud-sofys, or studyin' up blood-curdlin' pictur's of hell-sarpents, and undyin' worms, and unquenchin' flames for a warnin' to her neighbor sinners, as Parson Peck says.

"Well, that job's done, and no shirkin' either, leavin' dark corners and grease stains. If I h'aint time to look out for my soul, I don't smudge my floors with shiftless work; but maybe!"—the thought was so tremendous that her watery blue eyes grew suddenly dilated with alarm, as she put her scrubbing pail and brush in their accustomed places, and glanced around her spotless kitchen with a look of awe.

Rows of shining pans glistened in the afternoon sunlight on her snowy shelves. The half-open pantry door disclosed loaves of delicately browned bread and tempting pies, and many dozen glasses of fruit jellies, and jars of savory pickles, while golden pats of butter peeped from muslin-covered crocks in the adjoining dairy, and pans of yellow cream stood waiting skimming, and everywhere was visible the touch of the careful housewife and thrifty labor.

"But maybe!"—still she gave no voice to her startling thought, as she stood and surveyed with critical and piercing gaze the results of her hard months of toil. Her neighbors would hardly have recognized this Hannah Drudge, standing there with quivering frame and horror-stricken countenance.

"Hannah never did have very deep feelin's," said widow Brown to spinster Sharp, who lived over the way.

"Yes! she don't appear to take no interest outside of that kitchen of hern," replied spinster Sharp, who was the walking "Town Topics," and supplied the latest tid-bit of gossip in return for her self-invited presence at her neighbors' tea tables.

"But maybe!" murmured Hannah Drudge, in her well-ordered kitchen, unconscious of the unflattering remarks of her nearest neighbors. But the thought was yet too unfamiliar in the sparsely-stocked brain of Hannah Drudge to find language to give it utterance; but it burnt there in her soul deeper and deeper, until she fled from her kitchen, as though pursued by some invisible presence, up to her comfortless bed-room, hoping in some way to shake off the haunting idea. She hastily opened her window and gazed towards the western horizon, all aglow with the ever miraculous glory of sunset splendor, like a cloud temple—as though a ray from the throne of the Infinite had escaped through the "Gates Ajar."

"But maybe!" whispered the weary woman, with awe-stricken eyes, for the sunset glory only made the thought in her soul knock with more importunate pleading upon the closed doors of her spiritual being. "Oh, maybe!" she gasped, and turned from her window in agony to catch a glimpse of her own worn, faded face in her small cracked mirror.

What was this mysterious arousing within her? Ah! the electric thrill caused by a ray of Infinite truth had touched her dumb soul. The miracle was working, though she knew it not. The universe vibrates with manifestations of Omnipotence, Omniscience and Omnipresence, and every now and then a soul is touched by the thrill of God's presence.

She glanced hurriedly from the faded eyes in the mirror to a picture hanging beside it, a sketch of herself in her youth, made by a traveling artist. It was not high art, but the eyes of the pictured girl spoke volumes to that weary woman.

"Hannah Drudge, that was you once!" she murmured, and she looked back into the mirror with frightened face, dreading and yet impelled to note the appalling indifference in the two countenances.

"Not much alike!" she snapped through her shut teeth, "and maybe!"—but the horror of that thought banished all her petty feelings of wounded vanity, as she whispered: "When that pictur' was painted do you remember your feelin's, Hannah Drudge? Hav' ye forgot how ye made up your mind what ye'd make of yourself? Do ye think on it, how ye planned to live to some purpose above pots and kittles?

"Perhaps ye don't remember that evenin' at the sunset in the meadow when somebody let down the bars for your cows to pass through; and—yes!"—defiantly; "you may as well stand it—that kiss—as the moon rose—and the promise! Much your lips look like kisses now," she harshly chided as she gazed in the cracked mirror in agonizing self-scorn. "Yes, yes! I know all your excuses!" as her self-love arose to defend itself. "You thought you were serving God and your parents by breaking your promise to that faithful young man, and, of course, the breaking of his heart, and—yes!—you may as well own it—this time, Hannah Drudge, you are forced to own up the truth—the breaking of your heart as well.

"What if, maybe, you find, Hannah Drudge, while you've been scrubbin' and washin' and feedin', you've starved your own soul to everlastin' nothin'ness—a soul skeleton, Hannah Drudge. Oh, Lord! I was so busy makin' pickles and pies, and so tired with scrubbin' and cleanin' I couldn't take time to think of my soul. Your elbow grease won't count for much of an answer to that, Hannah Drudge.

"'But Ebenezer?' Yes, Ebenezer! remember him, too, Hannah Drudge. Have ye cared for his soul?

"'Why, he's an out an' out exhorter! You're not to blame there,' spoke up self-love.

"Yes, but Hannah Drudge, that don't excuse you. What sign do ye giv' him of watching over his soul food? When ye find ye've left this body behind in the grave, Hannah Drudge, what kind of a soul will you hav' to present as a tenement for a mansion up there?"

The agonized woman buried her gray head in her thin, knotted, wrinkled hands and sobbed in despairing self-disappointment.

"The crops hav' been middlin' good, Hannah, an' I've sold the ten acre lot with a profit, an' I've 'bout made up my mind to double the farm hands this year and double the plantin'. Of course that will make a little more cookin' and washin' in the house, but in-door work comes so handy to you, I suppose you'd be kinder lonesome without it. I am glad you were never took up with them wimmin's notions 'bout foolin' away their time with books and sich like."

"I can't do it, Ebenezer," replied Hannah with decided tone and quiet, yet determined manner. "I've come to the conclusion that a woman's as worthy of her hire as a man is. If you've laid by enough to do what you say, you can pay me for the twenty years I've slaved for you at the rate of the wages of a common woman help."

"Why, Hannah Drudge, be ye crazy?" cried Ebenezer. in amazement. "Hav' ye took up with the pomps an' the vanities of this here sinful world?"

"No, Ebenezer!" answered his sister, mildly. "Is it any more worldly for a woman to be paid for her labor than for a man? Hav' any of your farm hands worked harder than I hav'?"

"An' because you've lived like a sensible woman all your life, do ye want to live now like a fool, wastin' your substance in riotous livin', puttin' on worldly fixin's and gaddin' 'bout as a busybody, meddlin' in your neighbors' affairs?"

"No, Ebenezer! because I've been livin' like a fool I want to live now like an accountable woman, who has got not only a body, but a mind and a soul to answer for. With the wages I've earned all these years I can hire a young girl to help me, who'd be glad of the home and the trainin'. I shall be independent, which is woman's right as well as a man's, and I shall have leisure to take some thought of the feedin' of my immortal soul. I'm condemned, Ebenezer," she continued, while a flush dyed her thin cheeks and a light flashed in her dull eyes; "I might most as well hav' been a heathen for all the time I've giv' to my soul."

"Why, Hannah! you went regular to meetin', even if ye wasn't gifted to exhort like some of us."

"Yes, Ebenezer! I went to meetin', as ye say, but I was so wore out with cookin' and scrubbin' that I was too tired to think and too beat out to pray. Cookin' and scrubbin's well in their place, I don't say they can be dispensed with, and if ye was poor and strugglin' it would be my duty to slave, though even then, less pickles and pies and more leisure for soul-food and Bible readin' would be accordin' to Scriptur'. I tell ye, 'tain't only the world's folks who make a god of the body. Now, my soul's been starved long enough. I'm goin' to look after my spirit, for there'll come a time, Ebenezer, when crops and cookin' and scrubbin' will be done with forever, and then what?"

"Why, Hannah, I don't deny the good of exhortin' an' warnin' the sinners, an' lookin' after the shortcomin's of your neighbors, an' bein' punctual in class meetin' an' firm in church disciplinin' the weak brethren, an' expellin' the errin' an' denouncin' the backslidin'. You know Parson Peck gives me credit fur bein' a strong supporter in rebukin' the young an' fur picturin' hell-fire."

"But what of your soul, Ebenezer? Does it feed on the Bread of Life as often as your body is nourished with vi't'als? Do ye work as hard at carryin' out the Golden Rule as ye do in plantin' and plowin'?"

"Accordin' to Scriptur', wimmen warn't exhorted to preachin'," replied Ebenezer, as he took his hat from a peg on the wall, and fearing more searching questions, he added: "That's a strange notion of yourn 'bout wages, but sence ye seem to think it's your right, make out the sum ye're entitled to, at the rate ye hav' reckoned on," and he hastily closed the door and went out to his farm work.

"They do say Hannah Drudge has a hired girl!" said spinster Sharp to widow Brown, as she hurried into her neighbor's house one morning with her bonnet strings half tied and her shawl awry in her haste to spread the news. "And they do say Hannah Drudge goes every afternoon to see the sick and take them a glass of jelly or a cup of cream, and they do say," she continued, hardly taking time to catch her breath between her important items of news, "that Hannah Drudge has joined a class for Bible study; and they do say that her brother Ebenezer has paid her wages for these past twenty years all in one lump of money, and Hannah don't even buy herself a new dress, but wears the old alapacy gown she's had these five years; and she's payin' the schoolin' fur two of them children of that worthless drunkard, Ben Burt."

"Lordemassy! to think of Hannah Drudge thinkin' of anything but her pies and pickles!" ejaculated widow Brown.

"And they do say," continued spinster Sharp, "that the hired girl she's took in is that Sal Rivers, what went to the bad, but folks say has reformed. I believe in sendin' money to furrin missions, but I wouldn't help sech truck."

"And they do say," continued spinster Sharp, proud of being the bearer of such momentous gossip, "that Hannah Drudge has took a child out of the poorhouse to bring up; she who could never abide a stray cat in her clean kitchen, havin' a brat from the poorhouse around to meddle and muss; and they do say Ebenezer don't exhort quite so hard on the sinners, but walks quite meechin' like to meetin' with Hannah Drudge and that Sal Rivers and the poorhouse brat, for Hannah insists on the house bein' shut up in meetin' time so they can all git to church."

"Wall, I never!" exclaimed widow Brown. "What in the world has come over that Hannah Drudge?"

"I'm jest on my way over to her house," said spinster Sharp, rising to go, "I'm that curious to find out what Hannah Drudge does about her cookin' and scrubbin'. Wouldn't it be a strange sight to see her settin' in her best front room what has been shut up fur twenty years, instid of on her knees scrubbin' her kitchen floor."

She found Hannah Drudge in her best front room telling the little child from the poorhouse the story of the Babe in Bethlehem, and her curious eyes caught sight of a fine looking girl in the kitchen baking as delicate loaves of bread as were ever turned out by Hannah Drudge herself.

Spinster Sharp made an excuse to leave the house by the back door in order to say to the girl: "How do you like the place?"

"God bless her! Miss Hannah has saved me from despair and from suicide," said the grateful girl with eyes full of tears; "the Lord will reward her!"

HOW WOMEN REACH THEIR CONCLUSIONS.

"The conclusion which man reaches by a process, woman reaches by intuition." We should as little think of entering into an argument concerning the above statement as of disputing with the man who assured us that in a dense fog he shingled ten feet beyond the roof of his barn on to the fog without discovering his mistake; in either case we should expect our informant to laugh in our face, with no attempt to conceal his scorn at our stupidity in not discerning the joke, were it not that we know for a certainty that it is actually accepted as truth by intelligent people. Our attention has been recently called to it in an emphatic way by finding it in an admirable article on woman's work in the church, which otherwise we heartily indorse. But the very fact that it is in the midst of sound truth, expressed in clear and pithy language, renders the evil of this most venerable superstition the greater.

This popular superstition concerning woman's intuitional powers belongs to what Bacon calls "the idols of the market"; that is, it arises from the careless use of words, for surely no one who really took into account the meaning of "intuition" would ever repeat the statement quoted above. The word is used in two senses. In its lower sense it means all knowledge obtained directly and in this sense is possessed by animals. Its higher meaning is the perceiving of truth directly; by intuition, when used in this latter sense, the human mind, male or female, perceives only those primary, fundamental truths which are so simple that they cannot be explained, as, for example, "things that are equal to the same thing are equal to each other." The sound mind accepts this as truth at once, but will strive in vain to give any reason for it. It is outside the realm of things to be proved by reasoning. If one does not perceive the truth of the statement as soon as uttered, there is no process of reasoning by which he can be made to see it. All truth perceived by intuition is of this character, and its range is very limited. When we go a step beyond this kind of truth we must reach the additional truth by the process of reasoning. To suppose that woman reaches her conclusions by intuition alone logically places her on a level with the brute creation, by confining intuition to its lowest meaning; or, if the word is used in its higher meaning, makes her partake of the divine power of Omniscience. God alone sees all truth directly, i. e., by intuition.

Those who believe in this lack of reasoning power on the part of woman were once consistent enough to hold that it was impossible for woman to master mathematics, but the facts of these last twenty-five years have exploded this idea, as women in our colleges have proved themselves the equal of men in mathematics as well as in literature. Yet while the logical conclusion has been given up, the sex which assumes to monopolize all the reasoning power of the race still clings to the premise from which the conclusion is absolutely inseparable. No one claims that in mathematics woman reaches her conclusions by intuition; the professor of mathematics treats with withering scorn the student, be he male or female, Greek or Jew, bond or free, who gives as a sufficient proof of a problem in geometry that "he can see it is true." He or she must be able to give each successive step from premise to conclusion. Our girls have shown themselves equal to the problems not only of geometry but of all the higher mathematics, and not one of them has asked or received exemption from reaching the desired Q. E. D. (which was to be proved) by the "process" of reasoning on the ground of her peculiar powers of "intuition."

To suppose that woman reaches her conclusions in the field of probable reasoning by any other method than that of the use of her reasoning powers is as absurd as to suppose that she reaches the demonstrations of pure mathematics by intuition. It is true, of course, that many men and many women fail to reason about things, and all their lives are guided by prejudice and superstition, but this is a human failing, not a sex failing, except in so far as woman's environment has tended to aggravate this weakness.

Why this popular superstition concerning woman's reasoning faculties has so generally obtained, may be as difficult to answer as to account for other popular superstitions which calmly hold their ground even after scientific experiments have proved them false; but to our minds there are two reasons which satisfactorily account for the delusion in question. The first is the determination of a large class of people to magnify the difference between the sexes. Parents begin before their babies are able to sit alone to provide girls with dolls and other similar toys, while the boys are given balls, whips, etc. Before the children can understand, they are assured that such and such things are beneath the dignity of boys, and girls are informed that their main business in life is to stay in the house, take care of their complexions and keep their clothes immaculate. Boys are given to understand that "boys will be boys," and they soon learn that they are expected, as a matter of course, to give free vent to the animal life within them, run, shout, develop rugged health; rush into the house with muddy feet, leaving all the doors open behind them, and strew things around for their sisters to pick up, as that is preëminently "girls' work."

Then these same parents in after years tell complacently of the wonderful inborn difference between boys and girls, and how soon the distinctive sex characteristics begin to show themselves. From these differences people reason to other and greater differences of mind and body, and, having made their theory, the facts are forced to fit.

The second cause is to be found in this, that uneducated people are always unable to trace or state the processes by which they reach their conclusions, and up to the present century women have been practically uneducated. The man who can neither read nor write will take a yard-stick, measure a floor and tell you how many yards of carpet are necessary to cover it; yet if you were to question him as to his reasons for being so confident that his method was correct, he would be astonished. He might tell you that "any fool could see it," and yet, no fool would suppose for a moment that he reached his conclusion by intuition. He, as truly as the most learned mathematician, reasoned from the fundamental truth that "things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other," the floor is equal to a certain multiple of the yard-stick, therefore the carpet which covers it must be equal to the same multiple. So it is in all kinds of reasoning, ignorant and learned alike reason from certain fundamental truths. The fact that the former do not know that they thus reason does not affect the matter at all, nor that they are not able to give the steps of that reasoning.

Men differ as greatly among themselves in this regard as they are supposed to differ from women. The great debater is simply the one who is able to state exactly his premises and then show clearly each successive step by which he has reached his conclusion. Not all men excel in this, yet no one thinks of saying that the man who is unable to give a reason for the faith that is in him, reaches his results not by the process of reasoning, but by intuition. It is quite as absurd to say that women do. Moreover, in these days of educated women, those women who have studied their own mental processes utterly disclaim this false and vicious theory. They know that they reach their conclusions logically, there may sometimes be errors in their premises and mistakes in their logic, there seems sufficient reason to believe that such errors also occur with the masculine mind, but be the process faulty or accurate, the result incorrect or correct, the process is the same, it is the reasoning process.

I have spoken of the opposite theory as vicious and harmful. Falsehood is always harmful and if no evidence of its evil results were to be seen we might yet be sure that sometime the evil would become apparent. There is abundant evidence of the injurious results of this mistaken notion. Girls become in early life possessed of the idea that they have peculiar intuitional but defective reasoning powers. They therefore neglect the training of the one and depend upon an unknown, mysterious something which they know only by name. The result is they mistake their emotions and prejudices for the indiscoverable faculty on which they suppose they are to rely. This is one reason why women as a class are more in bondage to prejudice and their feelings than men are and less susceptible to reason. The theory, therefore, that woman substitutes intuition for reason has become one of the great obstacles to woman's development, and it is time that every woman set herself to dispel the delusion.

THE SNARE OF THE FOWLER.

There is reason to believe that an unusually large number of procurers and procuresses are abroad in the country gathering up young and venturesome girls for the dens of vice in this city. The most attractive palaces of sin will be located as near Jackson Park as property can be rented for such purposes.

A variety of traps are set for the unwary. To expose those that have come to our knowledge is to anticipate the work of protection and rescue which will tax us here to the utmost during the coming summer. The burden may be shared, or at least lightened by our members everywhere, if they understand the situation and are able to intelligently warn self-supporting and unprotected girls, the ones most likely to be approached and ensnared.

Many of these infamous purveyors masquerade as keepers of intelligence offices. Undoubtedly a large number of persons are doing a legitimate business between the "out-of-works" and the "out-of-helps," but it is not easy to identify the honest ones, and the difficulty has become greater since the city does not require the business to be licensed. Now the most unprincipled person can announce an "employment bureau," put advertisements in country papers and lure ambitious young women to their ruin. Sometimes names of parties are given as reference who have no knowledge of the scheme. Domestic labor rarely looks up the references of employers.

All bids from Chicago for help may be looked upon with distrust at this time, for there are more people now seeking work in the city than could find it if the Exposition were running as successfully as the most sanguine stockholder has ever dreamed. We receive letters every day from women offering themselves for every kind of position, from that of dish-washer to that of interpreter of half a dozen languages. The answer is the same to all: We know of no vacancies. If there are any, they are in the field of competent domestic service, where, like the proverbial "top," there is always room.

Women seeking such positions can safely trust the Bureau of the Columbian Association of Housekeepers, the employment agency of the Young Woman's Christian Association, or that of Hull House. The latter is a free bureau. Equally reliable ones there may be, but these are unquestionable. No one should come to the city to "take chances" of getting employment. The chances are against her. Unless she has definite prospects of a position she may be subject to delay until her money is gone, and then, if not before, will she find the net spread that has entangled wiser ones than she. The Woman's Protective agency, the Children's Aid Society, our Anchorage and all kindred institutions are taxed to their utmost in caring for such unfortunate girls, far from home, out of money and unable to get work. A few are sheltered till friends can be communicated with and means obtained to send them home, but many more fall into lives of shame.

A man to be shunned is the "agent of a large concern employing women," who gives a fictitious name, and a fictitious number for "the house," the only real thing about him being the villainy he carefully hides. One of these visited the office of a reliable woman physician in one of our suburban towns, inquiring for "help." She became suspicious of his purpose and character and put the authorities on his track. In his trial it came out that he had an accomplice, and together they were canvassing the town for the purpose of securing girls to recruit a brothel.

The "pleasant lady" appearing, a stranger, in a country town, or on quiet streets in the suburbs, who takes walks and stops to talk with the nurse girls she meets, is another variety of procuress. When sufficiently well acquainted she offers to get the girl a position with a friend of hers where the work is easier and the pay better. Beware of any one who offers light work and large wages. The middle-aged woman, dressed plainly, often in mourning, spreads the snare for many unprotected girls upon incoming trains. She takes advantage of the loneliness they feel as strangers approaching the great city. She talks with them, and they learn that she lives here and knows all about the city. She offers to tell them just where to go for lodgings or for employment. Later, to their dismay, they find the house they have been in is disreputable, and their prospect of finding respectable positions damaged. Then the luring side of a "gay" life is painted to them, and very few make any effort to escape.

It is not necessary to believe the sensational rumor that "a syndicate of procurers has contracted to furnish the brothels of this city with twenty-five thousand fresh girls this spring." That any concerted or systematic plan exists is highly improbable, but it is probable that evil will quicken its pace, and pay its emissaries well, making it more profitable than ever for individuals to ply their demonish trade. We, too, must be swift to do, to warn, counsel, prevent, protect, finally to rescue.

A most practical measure would be the placing of a matron in each of the city railway stations. While we believe that the larger number of cabmen and policemen are trustworthy, it still remains true that there are many unprincipled ones, and these are alert to serve the young girl, who for any reason is uncertain about where she will go. There is a large opportunity here for any one with means and disposition to support a practical preventive philanthropy.

COMPLETE VINDICATION OF TEMPLE AFFAIRS.

Mrs. Carse's vindication of the Temple enterprise is completed in this issue. Its force, fairness and pertinence are self-evident. While THE UNION SIGNAL deplores the occasion of this defense, it hails the clearing of the atmosphere.

There has been an element of opposition to the Temple since its inception. One member of the W. C. T. U. has steadily opposed it, as she had every right to do, in all National conventions—for reasons frankly stated and carefully weighed by the conventions—but the Temple has steadily grown in the affections of our women and the building has become the admiration and pride of this city of great buildings—waiting, as a thing of life, the day of fulfillment of its endowment mission to every state, and Mrs. Carse's dream of a Temple all our own. This Temple is built and by friendly hands; there remains no work to be done but the raising of funds.

If there are any who have doubted, since Mrs. Carse's exhaustive answer to her cruel arraignment, these may now have peace of mind. If there are any who may be shaken they should reflect impartially that Mrs. Carse has had no policy that is not the policy of the Board of Temple Trustees, most of whom are state presidents: Frances E. Willard, Lady Henry Somerset, Mary T. Lathrap, Clara C. Hoffman, Marion H. Dunham, Helen M. Barker, Susan S. Fessenden, Nannie E. Munnell, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, Mrs. W. Jennings Demorest, Helen L. Hood, Harriet B. Kells. These trusted leaders know their responsibility, are familiar with every condition, are united in purpose, have a conscientious regard for the manner in which the gift fund is used, have able legal counsel and know what to do and how to do it, to acquire the ownership of the Temple. With such guardianship who shall imply that the smallest contribution intrusted shall be misappropriated or misapplied?

The value of the Temple as an endowment is no longer a question; when broached in 1887, it was properly subject for debate. THE UNION SIGNAL speaks advisedly in stating that it is a better investment than $1,200,000 in cash, or in six per cent first-class bonds, for recent transfer of neighboring property indicates a marked increase of value, and the Temple is worth more to-day than the day it was completed.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean, one of the leading journals of the West, says:

When a man makes a public attack upon a woman he must have a strong case, and show that his motive is of the best, or he can create no public sympathy for himself or his cause. The natural inclination of men of true mental timbre is to resent an attack upon a woman without considering the possibility of its justification. Mrs. Carse's answer certainly ought to convince any unprejudiced man or woman, not only of Mrs. Carse's integrity, but of the fact that she is a woman of excellent business ability.

To erect a building, the handsomest in this city of handsome buildings, at a cost of $1,200,000, and retain control of it with only the voluntary contributions which the members of the W. C. T. U. Association might send in as a basis, was a feat which very few business men would undertake and which still fewer would be successful in. But Mrs. Carse undertook just such a feat and accomplished it.

We believe not only that the Temple bonds are good, but that the methods adopted to secure the control of the building company represent financial genius and courage rarely seen. Certainly Mrs. Carse has shown the traits of a successful financier, and if the association will continue to sustain and follow her the Woman's Temple will not only become a monument to the devotion of its members to the cause of temperance, but a paying investment that will be an aid to that cause for many long years to come."

The Chicago Evening Post, another most influential daily journal, states:

Despite Mrs. Carse's emphatic denial and her remarkably full and convincing statement of the W. C. T. U. Temple finances, the unmanly attack upon both the lady and the enterprise continues in the public press. The assailants have abandoned (or, more likely, been driven from) the more reputable journals; but in obscure and unscrupulous prints they still find a vehicle for their assaults. It is not to be believed that such attack can be sustained even in its present guerrilla form. The foundation of alleged fact upon which it was based has all been cleared away by the express denial of the bankers whose names were unauthoritatively and untruthfully cited at the beginning. Nothing now remains except the motives of the slanderers, and these are easily recognizable in one of two guises: spleen and blackmail.

The Chicago Herald, one of the oldest of the great papers of this great World's Fair City, thus gives its indorsement:

It is impossible for any fair-minded man or woman to understand the attacks made from certain quarters upon Mrs. M. B. Carse in her capacity of manager of the Woman's Temple, of this city. The building itself is a beautiful structure. It is an honor to the city and a splendid monument to the labors of noble and self-sacrificing women in a worthy cause. That Mrs. Carse is an enterprising and clear-headed business woman is shown by the convincing reply which she made to her accusers. Every one of the accusations against her is taken up and answered in such a way as to leave no doubt or question possible. While Mrs. Carse refuses to be drawn into a newspaper controversy, she covers the whole ground in so conclusive a manner that further debate is rendered impossible. The time and manner of bringing the charges against her management of the Temple were in themselves so cowardly as to excite suspicion. Mrs. Carse boldly mentions the names of the prominent gentlemen who indorsed the financial policy of the enterprise and explains their connection with it. She reviews her own association with the undertaking and accounts lucidly for every cent of money that has passed through her hands. She shows the financial standing of the enterprise to be good and improving. The result of her labors and of those of the noble women associated with her shows for itself. It is evident that the management of the Woman's Temple is worthy of continued encouragement on the part of every one interested in the cause of temperance.

The Convention at Denver in open session, after debate, passed the following resolution:

WHEREAS, The financial standing of the Temple has never before been so secure and the outlook so hopeful as now,

Resolved, That we will not cast doubt upon this enterprise; that we will not create distrust; that if any cannot help they shall at least allow those who will do so, peace of mind in the doing. Further, it is the sense of this convention that for the sake of the W. C. T. U. and the great work to which it is pledged, and for the sake of the cause of woman's advancement in the world, there is but one just and reasonable course to pursue. That we stand with solid front and united effort until we reach the successful and triumphant completion of this great enterprise.

What does this mean if not, "As a convention we have patiently considered all objections, both to the Temple as an endowment scheme and to the processes taken toward its acquirement." As Abraham Lincoln suggested: The wisdom of all is more trustworthy than the wisdom of one; so in the end, as in the beginning, THE UNION SIGNAL reiterates: "If any can not help they shall at least allow those who will do so, peace of mind in the doing."

MRS. IDA H. READ, the new president of Vermont, a most capable and thoughtful woman, has written by request of our National president to leading men and women in the state as to the workings of prohibitory law. She reports that not one has replied unfavorably. The secretary of the state says, "Prohibition is by no means a failure; the law is violated, as a matter of course, but in no greater proportion than many other laws where there is the same degree of temptation both to the seller for gold and the drinker with a depraved appetite." A professor in one of the colleges writes: "Prohibition is a great restraining power in the communities of our state. The drink traffic and drink habits of Vermont, compared with those in the adjoining commonwealth of New York, are vastly in favor of New York. The trade in drink is under ban and reputable people avoid engaging in it. To be sure, many officials are slow in carrying the law into effect, but it is better executed than liquor laws in license states." Mrs. Read says: "The consensus of opinion is that the state is better off than if we had license, high or low. Not one has suggested that a change to high license would be to our advantage. This has pleasantly surprised me, for I took pains to ask not only those who favored prohibition, but men whom I had reason to fear were not strong for our cause. What we need is the ballot of women to help elect officers committed to the enforcement of law. Our suffrage bill passed the House but we lost it in the Senate. This does not, however, one whit discourage us, woman's era has dawned, and through her humanity will reach a higher position than ever before."

It is of little use to say "Our Father who art in Heaven," unless you stretch out a helpful hand to your brother who is upon the earth.

It is the pulpit's duty to keep people away from the drink. It is the statesman's duty to keep drink away from the people, but where one of these ends and the other begins is a thing that no one can find out; for which reason it would seem that the two spheres overlap, and that the noblest statesman is largely a divine, and the best Doctor of Divinity something of a statesman.

Well understood it is that the real "power behind the throne" in politics is the saloon. Seldom, however, are the eyes of a respectable voter more plainly opened to this fact than were those of a Chicago gentleman, a Presbyterian elder of strong party proclivities, who made up his mind this spring to do his whole duty as a citizen and attend the ward primary. Mistaking the correct precinct at first and being afterward misdirected, he found himself in turn at three saloons and dropped his vote at the last one! Such, however, is his faith in the "party" to which the saloon-elected candidate belongs that he will bestow his suffrage on this nominee. Surely there are "none so blind as those who won't see"!

Who can call work for shop-girls irrelevant to the temperance movement? What is it leads them to drink? It is wretched fare, miserable quarters at home, insufficient food and wearying hours of ill-requited toil. If we have any justice it behooves us to look into this cause and not deal forever and a day with the effects of the liquor traffic and with these alone.

An Arab once asked the Most High to permit him to train a tree in his own way that he might exhibit his great abilities and show how much better it could be done than is the custom. This permission was granted and he worked a year shielding the little tree from every adverse breeze, tempering the sunshine to its boughs, mellowing the earth about its roots, and caring for it as one cares for a pet child. But when the year was up, behold, the poor little tree was stunted and did not at all compare with its brothers of the wilderness, which under the culture of God, with the winds to buffet, the storms to descend, the floods to come, had grown and flourished, sending their roots deeper down and their branches further out in their reaction on the elements about them. So is every one that is born of the Spirit.—Hannah Whitall Smith.

Miss Willard has been interviewed in many leading English papers, one of which says: "To English ears it is something quite fresh and novel to hear her talk, and it is equally interesting to read what she says. The fact that Miss Willard gave up a highly paid post, one of great distinction and honor and perfectly congenial, was referred to by her in the following original sentence: 'I sacrificed nothing by turning to temperance work. Then I journeyed on the sidewalk; now I walk in the middle of the highway, taking the dust,' adding in her reference to the work of the active members of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 'that is what we women are trying to do; we don't ask an easier place, we rather like it. We do not make any martyrdom of it, nor turn up the corners of our eyes.' When one thinks of the various departments of this great organization and what is entailed in the work, which is preventive, educational, evangelistic, social and legal—with its missionaries on their toilsome and responsible journeys round the world, it is easy to understand what 'taking the dust' in the middle of the road means to those who are giving health, talents, name and time to this splendid work for the betterment of the world."

ON DUTY.

KANSAS KERNELS.

Kansas has gotten for herself considerable notoriety this winter through the medium of her legislature, though some of us feel as did the child, who, questioned by her mother on going to bed as to whether or no she had told the Lord in her prayer how naughty she had been, replied that she had not, as she did not think it best to tell of it out of the family! And we feel that if our law-makers, when they assembled, had adopted the method of W. C. T. U. conventions, and united heartily in singing that good old hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds," by the time they had finished singing it they would have been ready to settle down quietly to business. I am thankful, for our credit, that it was not a legislature composed of women instead of men, and that the benefits of our prohibitory law have again been tested, for, had there been as free whisky at Topeka during our "late unpleasantness" as there is in license states, bloodshed would have been the inevitable result. Acts impelled by whisky-crazed brains could not have been kept under the control of reason.

We are certainly thankful that peace reigns once more, and that the interest of woman's advancement, politically, has been considered. A bill to fully enfranchise Kansas women has passed both houses of the legislature, with, I believe, but four dissenting votes in the senate, and in the house it stood, ayes, eighty-four, nays, seventeen. Of the latter, eight were Populists, seven Republicans and two Democrats. The announcement of the result was greeted with hearty applause. The governor will no doubt sign the bill, if he has not already done so, and we shall have a summer's work before us to secure its adoption at the fall election. It will be no child's play, and we shall need the prayers and assistance of all friends of the cause in other states, as all the "powers of darkness" will be invoked by our opponents for its defeat, knowing, as they do, how much it means to all reforms, and particularly to the temperance question. If it does not come now, it must come sooner or later, and I almost feel like calling on "Josiah Allen's wife," with her combined wit, wisdom and invincible arguments, to come to our aid by issuing a leaflet, such as she alone could write, that could be effectively used at public meetings, or distributed among the voters of the state, and of other states in similar campaigns. Her arguments would convince many that public speakers could not affect.

The Agora, a Kansas quarterly magazine, devoted a large share of the space in its last number to a symposium, "Do Kansas women want to vote?" There were ten participants, among them our state president, Mrs. Grubb. I wish I could give a synopsis of the arguments advanced, both pro and con. One point that particularly claimed my attention was this: "If all women do not wish to vote neither do all men, as is proven by the urgent annual appeals to the voters to register, register, register!" and the manifest discrepancy between the number of voters and the votes cast at any election. Also the fallacy of the argument that all women must want to vote before the privilege be granted us, when this is a country where the "majority rule" is observed in everything else. I may seem to be giving this subject undue attention, but it is of vital moment now to Kansas, and to Kansas women particularly, and one in which the Kansas W. C. T. U. will be an active worker for months to come.

I think that the free text-book bill which I referred to in my last has also been acted upon favorably and Mrs. Hunt and her coadjutors will find a "field ripe for the harvest." The bill authorizes the books to be furnished at the opening of all schools in the fall, hence in order to secure the properly indorsed physiologies in all schools it will require the attention of the W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Mary Graham-Hay says of the Seneca union: "While we now number less than in the earlier days of our organization, still we have 'a name to live' and for the year past at least have been gaining both in numbers and interest. Parlor meetings are receiving a share of attention, and those that we have held were so pleasant, successful and profitable that we commend them to all unions. Several copies of THE UNION SIGNAL and Our Messenger are taken, are greatly prized and used to supply wall pockets in the railroad station. We have eight department superintendents, press, THE UNION SIGNAL and Our Messenger, mercy, peace, franchise, railroad work, scientific temperance and parlor meetings. We have a column in one paper, children's pledge cards in two Sunday-schools and are circulating the World's Petition. A new union was recently organized in the county."

Mrs. Julia A. Chase, state superintendent of work among soldiers, writes me: "Our state work goes on though I have not been out much this winter. I went to Washington, D. C., in September. While there I was invited to speak at the soldiers' home, and also at Ft. Meyers, which I did. I have since held one meeting at the soldiers' home in Kansas and have visited the United States military prison. The prison union is still flourishing. Many of the discharged members are, to my knowledge, occupying honorable positions in life and doing well. Some of our district and county superintendents are quite active in sending literature to the soldiers' homes at Leavenworth and Ft. Dodge and to the boys in the military prison, all of which is gratefully received. Some report having distributed leaflets at reunions and camp-fires. I am trying to get the district superintendents to introduce Mrs. McClees' quarterly, America's Defenders."

The good sisters of Hiawatha desire some notice taken of the visit to that place of Miss Jennie Smith, railroad evangelist, who captured all hearts at her first meeting by the simple narrative of her miraculous restoration to health. A goodly number of "her boys" met with her, by invitation, in the waiting-room of the depot. "Tears coursed down many cheeks as she talked to them of their best interests. She then rode over to the shops, shaking hands with the men there until her own hands looked as if she might have been cleaning engines herself. She attended the W. C. T. U., and urged more active work in her department. Some of the 'boys' called upon her at her place of entertainment. She also addressed a temperance mass-meeting, and at its close organized a Railroad Temperance Association. As we gathered about her for a few last words, before we were aware of it she had us working in a prayer-meeting for the boys, some of whom she held by the hand, while all were on their knees. Could she have remained longer no doubt great good would have been the result. The first work done after her visit was a social for the railroad people, that we might become better acquainted with them, and thereby gain their confidence and respect. For this social two hundred and twenty-five written invitations were sent out to railroad men, their families and friends. Refreshments were provided, consisting of coffee, sandwiches and cake, with also a nice musical program. The social was held at the home of the master workman of the shops, who seemed to heartily indorse the whole undertaking." They hope to have Mrs. Woodward, the National superintendent of railroad work with them ere long, to complete the work so well begun. The papers of Kansas City have been giving illustrated accounts of her meetings in that place this side the state line.

The first district W. C. T. U. held its spring meeting at Holton in the form of a school of methods. Papers were read on health and heredity and non-alcoholic medication, by Mrs. Hattie Cowan, of Valley Falls; Sabbath observance, by Mrs. S. M. Hartough, Leavenworth; Sunday-schools, by Mrs. Rosetta Hastings, of Farmington; narcotics, Mrs. R. M. Monroe, Whiting; scientific temperance instruction, Mrs. Delia H. Littlefield, Holton; social purity and petition work, Mrs. Julia A. Chase, Hiawatha; purity in literature and art, Mrs. L. M. Merrell, Leavenworth; press work, Mrs. G. F. Baron, Horton; fair work, Mrs. Lucy Rainsberger; work among colored people, Miss M. J. Mitchell, Leavenworth; prison work, Mrs. Anna F. Miller, Leavenworth; conference with influential bodies, Mrs. Ruth F. Durgan, Atchison; mercy, Mrs. Eva Odle, Wetmore; railroad work, Mrs. L. C. Stahley, Horton; franchise, Maggie Milligan, Denison; peace, Mrs. Mary Vickers, of Seneca. Each paper was followed by an interesting and profitable discussion of the same topic.

The first evening's program consisted of a parlor meeting, at which time Mrs. Thurston, of Topeka, conducted a question-box. Following this refreshments were served, and a social season was enjoyed by all. On the second evening Miss Maggie Milligan read a paper, and Master Garfield Black delivered his oration, "Young America's War-cry." Following this came a symposium on the duty of citizens with reference to the enforcement of temperance laws, or prohibition, which was participated in by the mayor, county attorney and several prominent citizens.

Miss Amanda Way, the veteran temperance worker of Kansas, was present at the convention and added much to the interest of the different sessions.

On Thursday morning the ladies accepted the invitation of President Hoenshel, of Campbell University, to conduct the chapel service of that institution, after which Miss Way made a powerful appeal to the students to abstain from whisky and tobacco. During the convention Mrs. Ella W. Brown gave parliamentary drills. This district is doing much good work fighting drugstore permits and assisting in prosecutions; eighteen lectures have recently been given and many parlor meetings held.

NOTES.

Mrs. S. F. Grubb, our state president, is still in attendance upon her invalid daughter, now in Tucson, Arizona. Many prayers ascend for the daughter's recovery and the speedy return of the mother to her Kansas W. C. T. U. work.

Mrs. Haines, president of fourth district, is holding medal contests and meets with great success. She recently conducted three in Cheney and will have a gold medal contest for the district convention.

Mrs. Ella W. Brown, the president of first district, has been admitted to practice in the state supreme court.

Burlington union is having great success in its mothers' meetings which it holds each alternate Sabbath afternoon. Women are taking part in them who have never shown any interest in the W. C. T. U. heretofore, and so much interest is manifested as to almost make it necessary to hold them weekly instead of monthly as was at first intended.

NEW YORK STATE NEWS.

Oswego W. C. T. U. has been holding special revival services this winter in the slum part of the city, and with excellent results. Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, of Batavia, state superintendent of evangelistic work, was with them for a time, but as a preparation for her work, meetings were held for nearly three weeks previous to her coming. The management of these meetings was in the hands of Mrs. G. M. Gardenier, our efficient state recording secretary, who looked after the details, secured the help of pastors and other local workers, and when no one else could be had, did the preaching herself. She took charge of every meeting during the four weeks, and as a result was prostrated for three weeks following. During this time she was superintending the publishing of our state report, which owing to her illness was delayed a little, but all orders were filled as promptly as possible, and Mrs. Gardenier is anxious that every union in the state should be supplied with one or two copies of this book which is almost a necessity to an active working union. The price is only fifteen cents per copy. Will not the local unions throughout the state send in their orders at once?

While mentioning the reports I would not forget to speak of our state paper Woman's Temperance Work, which ought to be in the hands of every white-ribboner in our state. At a cost of only twenty-five cents a year, surely it is within the reach of all. It is only through such helps as these that we can keep in touch with each other and know of the work which is being done. The paper is published at our state headquarters, No. 30 West Twenty-third street, New York City, where the editor and publisher, Miss J. E. Dailey, is always glad to welcome visitors. It is a light, bright, homelike front room, with a nice carpet, desks, chairs, pictures, etc. The fine picture of Mother Thompson, which was presented at the convention in Broadway Tabernacle, smiles down upon all who enter. It is conveniently located and is just the place to meet a friend, to leave parcels while one is shopping, or to wait for a train or boat. Literature for state work is on sale here and orders taken for anything not kept on hand.

Juvenile work is advancing rapidly in our state under the management of Mrs. Harriet A. Metcalf, state superintendent, and cheering reports of the good work done in this department come to us. Mrs. Metcalf's plan for graduation is working finely. The manual published by the W. T. P. A. is the correct book to use to complete the course and receive a diploma. These manuals are kept on hand at state headquarters.

The L. T. L. of Owego, Tioga Co., recently gave a very delightful entertainment in the opera house under the able management of Mrs. Nellie Hutchinson. The cantata, "How we waited for Santa Claus," was rendered by one hundred children, who were costumed and arranged on elevated seats to represent an American flag of heroic size. Delegates in costume, representing the various nations bringing messages from their respective countries, were introduced and enthusiastically received. A most amusing number on the program was the "anti-gossip sewing circle" composed of little girls, who, while they deprecated gossip, reminded many an older one by significant glances and knowing looks of the irresistible charm of talking about one's neighbors. The proceeds of the entertainment were to defray the expense of a no-license campaign.

Madison county W. C. T. U. held its annual convention in the M. E. church at New Woodstock, with about fifty delegates present. Mrs. Weaver was present, and delivered a grand address, and helped in various ways toward the success of the gathering. The election of officers resulted in a reëlection of all except the treasurer, who had sent in her resignation. A ladies' quartette was one of the pleasing features of the meeting. Good resolutions were adopted, reports read, and much interesting business disposed of. The local union at Hamilton, in this county, reports an increase of interest in the various lines of work. It recently had a unique service, called an "Encouragement Meeting," of which many good words are spoken.

The Canastota union mourns the loss of an honorary member, James McPherson, whose recent death has deprived them of a true and stanch friend and brother. Our cause lay very near his heart, and during his illness he read THE UNION SIGNAL with keenest interest. His wife, whose death preceded his by less than two years, was one of the faithful workers, having carried the juvenile work through many seasons.

Rensselaer county convention was held at Lansingburgh, with a fine attendance. An excellent program was well carried out, which included music, recitations and short talks from the pastors, as well as reports, papers, on Scott's Emulsion, because fat foods make fat children. They are thin, and remain thin just in proportion to their inability to assimilate food rich in fat.

Scott's Emulsion

of Cod Liver Oil is especially adaptable to those of weak digestion—it is partly digested already. Astonishing how quickly a thin person gains solid flesh by its use!

Almost as palatable as milk.

etc. The address of the evening by Rev. W. H. Grote, of Waterford, was an able one, and well received, as was the singing by the Emerson quartette.

Chemung county W. C. T. U. met at Millport for its annual meeting. The county has a membership of three hundred and fifty with new ones being added right along. The annual address of the president, Mrs. S. M. Stoddard, showed a year of well directed effort, and the accomplishment of much good work. Routine business filled the day, and in the evening all listened with pleasure to an address by Frances E. Baldwin, of Elmira, chairman of the state prohibition committee. Mrs. Briggs rendered some excellent music at this meeting which all enjoyed. Another convention of this county is reported at the same time, this one being held at North Chemung, nearly every union being represented. A discussion on suffrage seemed to interest the large audience present, very many taking part, pro and con. A report of state convention was given which was well received, and a paper on "The needs of the local unions," by Mrs. Baldwin, was full of good points and suggestions. Following this came a discussion on license, which was intensely interesting and closed with a rising vote in favor of no-license. The evening address was given by Rev. Dr. Mills, of Elmira, on "Personal Responsibility."

Allegany county held its semi-annual convention at Scio in January. All the general officers and about one hundred delegates were present. A school of methods, taking up parliamentary usage, scientific temperance instruction and franchise, conducted by the different superintendents, was of special interest. An evangelistic service of thirty-five minutes followed, after which the subjects of non-alcoholic medication and physical culture received some attention. Mrs. L. P. Davies, of Utica, made the evening address supplemented by a few words from Mr. Nichols, a Prohibition speaker, who was present.

A glorious temperance revival under the labors of P. A. Burdick, the temperance evangelist, has taken place this winter in Deposit. It was not known until late on the Saturday preceding that the services of Mr. Burdick could be secured, therefore little advertising had been done. Notwithstanding, at the outset he was greeted by a good audience which expanded speedily into an audience beyond church capacities and the meetings were carried to the opera house where they continued during the rest of the week. More than 550 signed the pledge, including men who had been for years in alcoholic bondage. Even better than this, the Holy Spirit witnessed to the divine benediction upon the meetings by convicting of sin and converting to righteousness.

The public sentiment thus created has crystallized in the form of a Gospel Temperance Alliance officered by leading citizens of the community. It can scarcely be known to the reader what this radical change means to Deposit.

In my last letter I referred to the election of Miss Gale as school commissioner in Tompkins county, and stated that she was the first woman elected to fill that office in this state. I have since learned that this is a mistake, and that four others have filled the office,—Miss Mayhew and Mrs. Tibbitts of Oneida county, Mrs. Wilson of Onondaga, and Miss Kingsley, of Clinton county. I gladly make the correction.

The W. C. T. U., of Horseheads, Chemung county, carried on a vigorous warfare against the saloon by securing the services of the Silver Lake quartette for a week, and have reason to feel that good was accomplished. Mr. Mead always strikes telling blows against the liquor traffic. The music of the quartette never fails to reach the hearts of the people. Many regrets were expressed at the illness of Professor Chambers, which prevented his being present during the week. Your correspondent was telegraphed for to take his place, and responded promptly, doing what she could to help them in their time of need. Work is progressing in this county, and the women are alert and wide awake to the need of "keeping at it."

Mrs. Burt, our state president, as is usual at this time of year, is busy with legislative work, and keeps a sharp lookout for our interests. Petitions are being circulated, and sent in to the legislature, undoubtedly making happy (?) the hearts of our senators and assemblymen. We are gratified to learn that our petition for the full enfranchisement of woman is being signed fully and freely, with scarcely a person refusing. "The world do move."

PENNSYLVANIA.

NOTES HERE AND THERE.

The Altoona W. C. T. U. and friends of the temperance cause held a most interesting meeting recently in the Lutheran church of that city. An excellent paper, descriptive of the Temple, was read by Mrs. Wharton. A selection, by Miss Mary Kessler, recitations by little girls and an encouraging address by Rev. Spooner, made up the program. A collection was taken up for the Temple.

Miss H. Frances Jones filled appointments at Juniata, Seventh Ward, Altoona and Williamsburg. We find the contest work takes well. Williamsburg and Seventh Ward have held them, and a gold medal contest is to be held at the semi-annual convention.

The Hollidaysburg W. C. T. U. held a Sabbath evening union meeting not long ago, led by Rev. Owen James, at which five hundred dollars were raised for state work. This union has a reading-room in connection with its other work. DeLaney is quite a small place, but gives a good account of work done. Very interesting meetings are held, at which all take a part. There is a Loyal Temperance Legion of thirty members, which is flourishing.

The Tyrone union conducts a woman's exchange, and finds this a most satisfactory way to raise money. Mrs. Vida B. Baer, of Camden, N. J., has helped the union greatly by her addresses and personal work. Ten new members have been added to the Tyrone union. Railroad work has been made a specialty. Eighteen boxes have been filled.

New Wilmington, Lawrence county, union has secured the use of a column in the New Wilmington Globe, and will fill it regularly. A very enjoyable temperance tea was given recently by Mrs. Mary H. Jones, at state headquarters, at which about one hundred white-ribboners were present. Arrangements were made by those present to hold a bazaar, in March, to replenish the state treasury.

Chester county will hold a school of methods at West Grove in the near future. The Elizabeth union, Allegheny county, has held a memorial meeting in memory of Madam Willard; also a public meeting which was addressed by Mrs. McFarland, of St. John's, New Brunswick, who gave a very delightful account of the National Convention. A gift social to aid the sick and destitute has been held. About thirty dollars worth of food was contributed. Ten contests have been held. Their third anniversary was celebrated March 10th, by a public meeting at which addresses were made and mite-boxes opened.

Potter county held its semi-annual convention at Ulysses in February. This convention was opened with a parlor meeting, which was a very pleasant feature. Addresses were made by Mrs. Ensworth, county superintendent of parlor meetings, Mrs. Palmatier, Mrs. Cobb, Mrs. Reese and others. Reports from local presidents showed great activity. A very suggestive paper was read by Mrs. Stella Coulson, county treasurer. The second evening of the convention, the exercises were in charge of Miss Jessie Lewis, county superintendent of the Y. W. C. T. U. Mrs. Maggie Chapel recited an original poem; recitations, songs and an exercise, "The Light of the World," made up a very pleasing program. The Ulysses cornet band serenaded the delegates before the evening's entertainment began. Ulysses union has a very fine L. T. L. of eighty active members. The president's address and the reports of all the county superintendents were excellent.

Ellisburg and Andrews Settlement union held interesting health and heredity meetings, at which the subjects considered were "Health and Christian Duty," "Dress Reform," "Physical Training in the Home," and "Alcohol as a Medicine." This union, assisted by the Sons of Temperance, is preparing to send a victim of the morphine habit to a sanitarium. Ulysses union held a parlor meeting February 22, in the interest of the state fund.

Luzerne county is still at work. At Wilkesbarre, a boys' industrial school, under the able and efficient management of Mrs. H. W. Palmer, president of the Wilkesbarre union, is doing a grand work, and is the most popular institution of its kind in the city. The Wilkesbarre Y's have a girls' industrial school. The unions also conducted a very successful series of gospel temperance meetings with Mrs. J. K. Ellis, of Newark, New Jersey, as lecturer. Many signed the pledge and much good was accomplished. Avoca is always wide awake and up to the times. Before the election they secured a speaker and held public meetings once a week. They also held an "Old Folks' Contest," which was novel as well as interesting. The contestants were all old folks, and the prize, Miss Willard's "Glimpses," was awarded to Rev. Mr. Ellis, of Old Forge. They held a baby show and this also was very successful.

The Luzerne union hold their weekly meetings with the Free to All Temperance Club. They exercise a strong influence over the community which was shown by the increase of votes at the polls. The East and West Pittston unions held a chrysanthemum show, also a baby show, at which forty babies were on exhibition. A series of monthly meetings has been begun, the first being held in memory of Mary Allen West.

The state parlor meeting was held at the residence of Mrs. A. M. Holvey, February 24, at which Tallie Morgan, with a chorus of twenty trained voices, furnished the music. Excellent papers on woman's suffrage, by Mrs. M. W. Vaughn, of Moscow; Mr. E. D. Nichols, of Wilkesbarre, on "What Next"; Ed Griffith, Esq., of Scranton, spoke enthusiastically on "Our Cause," and an original poem, "He Calls," was recited by Mrs. Holvey. One hundred and fifty guests enjoyed the evening's entertainment.

The mid-year convention of Luzerne county W. C. T. U. was held at Avoca, March 2, Mrs. Downing, county president, presiding. Excellent papers were read by Mrs. Johnson on "Temperance Teaching in Sunday-school"; Mrs. Dr. Kesslor on "Unfermented Wine for the Lord's Table"; Mrs. Lance on "Can We be Discouraged"; Mrs. Squier on "Woman Suffrage"; Mrs. H. W. Palmer addressed the convention on "How Can I Find Time for my Work"; and the state president, Mrs. Hammer, gave a very fine lecture on "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union." An original poem by Mrs. Holvey and an address by Mrs. Vaughn on "Parlor Meetings," added interest to the sessions.

The Loyal Temperance Legion of Pennsylvania is in a prosperous condition. By the National report you will see that the "Keystone state" is the banner one for organization. The "Senior Grade" is becoming very popular. One hundred and twenty-nine graduates are now enrolled. Gettysburg Loyal Temperance Legion, which won the diploma prize banner, expects to add twenty more to its list. The Millville company, the first in the state to complete the course, are adding seals to their diplomas rapidly, and a number of new members have been added to the roll. A county L. T. L. has been organized, the first in the state.

Philipsburg, where the second state L. T. L. convention will be held in June, has now ten ready for diplomas and forty-eight studying for them. This company has three hundred enrolled members, and is divided into four divisions. Thousands of autograph cards will be sent to Chicago in a few days. One hundred and fourteen dollars and twenty-nine cents have been paid to the Willard Fountain. The sales tables also are not forgotten.

MICHIGAN ETCHINGS.

All lines of our work have a definite object, our social side as well as the more serious efforts. Mrs. C. Humphrey, of Adrian, Michigan's superintendent of literature, recently gave a Franco-German conversazione at her residence, herself reading Priere pour le Soir from a volume by M. Engel, who was a relative. With music, reading and recitation for a program, the remaining time was spent in conversation in three languages.

In the sixth district the Flint north side union gave a "good-by" to Mrs. G. H. Holman, who leaves us for Illinois. She has been an indefatigable local worker and a very efficient state superintendent. From the prettily gotten up invitations by the president, Mrs. Stevenson, at whose home the reception was held, to the gift and word and song, it was a loving tribute to the woman whom we delighted to honor.

Our press superintendent, Mrs. Jennings, is out with her yearly circular. She says, "We are told to 'Set ye up landmarks, make them high,' and one medium for landmarks is the press." Again from Williamston: "Our local union is flourishing. There is larger attendance than ever. Mothers' meetings are very popular. We have succeeded in getting scientific temperance instruction in the schools."

Lansing speaks of the good results of Dr. Tracy's work in increased membership. Dr. Ewing, state Sunday-school superintendent of the Congregational church, has given them a fine lecture. The writer adds, "We have a plan to continue this new work, for through the gospel every other department must depend for success." The president of Lenawee county writes of a new union at Cambridge, and says, "A fine country and intelligent women are here covering quite an extensive neighborhood. The county convention held some time ago was full, busy and successful."

Monroe county convention was held at London, March 22 and 23. Mrs. Benjamin, president of the fifth district, has been caring for her sick son at St. Mark's hospital, Grand Rapids. Speaking of the lovely roses sent her, she says, "The flower-mission department will have a new meaning after this." In the eighth district the Owosso union was entertained by the Vernon union. Among the discussions franchise was given an important place. The notes from the ninth district are too full of good works for our space. Mrs. Magoon has published an excellent leaflet on nicotine and sent copies to every union in the district.

Reed City has had four largely attended Sunday evening meetings, while its column in The Clarion excites favorable comment. Big Rapids has had a social at the home of the district president, Mrs. Morehouse, with a literary and musical program, and one hundred guests in attendance. The Shelby women, last month, distributed six hundred pages of our literature. From the eleventh district comes two items, the first of which can be imitated successfully all over the United States. Mrs. Carpenter writes: "I want to tell you how I became interested in W. C. T. U. work. Mrs. Clark, of Cleveland, sent me THE UNION SIGNAL for a year for a Christmas present; I count it the best present I ever received. I had not read THE UNION SIGNAL long, of course, before I wanted to belong to the white ribbon army. We have cottage prayer-meetings and a Bible reading every Wednesday afternoon led by our pastor, Rev. D. A. Green; his wife is also one of our best workers."

From East Gordon comes a card with officers' names, also topics for each meeting. "Temperance Work of the Past," "Of the Present," "Temperance Work Prospectively," "Why we Wear the White Ribbon," are some of the subjects.

I wish I might copy entire the memorial written by our president and sent to our legislature, relative to the liquor traffic, which was read and spread on the journal. The closing words are as follows: "Finally, we record the solemn conviction that the best element of our Christian civilization must soon unite in some effective way to utterly overthrow the liquor power in state and nation, and that you may find it consistent with your sense of duty to deal an effective blow upon this gigantic crime of crimes is and shall be the sincere prayer of your memorialists." Then followed the names of the general officers, and the journal added: "Referred to the committee on liquor traffic."

Our state paper this month is a brainy number. Mrs. Morehouse has a paper, "The Model Union." An editorial by Mrs. Parish, upon "The influence of the World's Fair upon our own and other countries," has this thought: "First, there will be a full exposition of the American drinking custom; second, our Sunday will not be ignored, it seems now, due no doubt to the memorials of the many religious organizations. The foreigners who come here will judge of us by our practices as a people, and they will pronounce upon our skill as workers by our industrial exhibit. The drink and the Sunday question come under legislative action, and therefore they will take on the complexion of legislation, and our country will be colored in the same shade in the eyes of our foreign company. Industrial art, agricultural, commercial, financial, literary and moral exhibits are enterprises, not national but individual or corporate, and they will bring credit to the individual or corporation, not to the government. Mrs. Lathrap's poem is a gem; I will copy three verses for you.

The year with its wonderful mystery of flowers,
Its velvet meadows and bloom-hedged bowers,
Its streams of silver and golden glow
Of marvelous beauty lies under the snow.
Under the glow
And under the gloom,
Of the surrounding snow
And the winter moon.

But whoever dreams it will always be,
That the snow will cover eternally,
Who thinks it, while lily and violet sweet
With promise of spring stir under the feet.
Under the snow
With a meek unrest
And a protest low,
Moves the year to its best.

If under the snow for a brief day lies
All that is good, the great Father is wise.
His summer hastens, a great bird sings
At heaven's lattice with restless wings.
Flowers are growing
God's flowers of truth.
His day is dawning
Upon the earth.

Since last writing, a beloved worker, Mrs. Harriet B. Jaynes, has "crossed over." Already with her it is well. Before I write again, Easter day, with its joy and light and comfort will have come and gone. How many more before our hopes are realized?

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions, for preparing and using. There are many Dress Stays that have sprung into existence since the "EVER-READY" were first put upon the market, and we suppose many more will follow. Some last a few weeks, some a few months, and as a cheap article, a few will always find sale, but the "EVER-READY" are used more and more. Why? They are the ONLY Dress Stays having gutta percha on BOTH sides of the steel, and consequently are perspiration proof, and, of course, will not rust. Then, too, they have the metal cap or tip on the ends, which prevent the steel from cutting through. As usual with all first-class articles offered for sale there are imitations. The "EVER-READY" are for sale everywhere and have name on back of each stay. See that you get them and nothing else.

GROWING ROSES.

There is a world of pleasure to be derived from a garden full of roses; even a single flower, in a little red pot, will brighten the home and bring good cheer. With the right kind of plants there is no difficulty in the way of everybody having the choicest roses; a little soil, water and sunshine is the only care they require, and they amply repay for the slight trouble and expense. The best roses for home culture are those grown by the Dingee & Conard Company at West Grove, Pa. For twenty-five years this firm has been propagating roses of every variety on their own roots and sending them by mail to every part of the land. Their method of starting a rose is peculiarly their own. When the plant leaves their hands it is ready to thrive and bloom in pot or garden. This firm publishes an illustrated "Guide to Rose Culture," which contains complete instructions for growing flowers of all kinds, and much other information interesting and valuable to the lover of flowers. They offer to send it Free, and enclose a specimen copy of their floral magazine, "Success With Flowers," to all who make application.

CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

PETITION OF THE WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE HOME
Addressed to the Governments of the World.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

NAMES. | RESIDENCES.

Wili not everybody who love the great cause of home protection, paste this petition on a nice, white sheet of paper and circulate it to the best of her ability, sending the names to Miss Alice E. Briggs, Evanston, Ill.?

APRIL MAGAZINES.

THE MAGAZINE OF POETRY. This is a quarterly review, published by Charles Wells Moulton, of Buffalo, N. Y. It gathers up in very pleasing shape, poems of all kinds from many authors, giving short, biographical sketches of the writers, with their portraits. A recent number contains excellent portraits of Tennyson and Whittier, Helen Hunt Jackson, Adeline Hohf Beery and others.

April WIDE-AWAKE is a true spring number. M. Carrie Hyde tells modern little folk how they made the Tansy Cake at Easter-tide, long ago in old England. A fair vision called "The April Child" looks out on WIDE-AWAKE friends from a forest of Easter lilies, Theron Brown offsetting the sweet picture by a beautiful poem. "Ebno'l Amed" is a story by Abdel Ardavan, of a truly heroic Arabian boy. In "How the Lilies Work," Kate Chapin relates how an offering of lilies from a sweet-hearted lassie subdues a hard-hearted neighbor to kindness.

D. Lothrop Company, Publishers, Boston.

The April WORTHINGTON'S magazine is an especially fine number. S. G. W. Benjamin has a well-written, finely illustrated article on "American War Ships of To-day." Mary A. Livermore's fourth paper, "In 'Ole Virginny,' —Fifty Years Ago," maintains in full measure the former intense interest of the story. "Phoebe," by Imogene Clark, "A Double Bow-Knot," by Katharine Festetits, and "The Duke's Easter Carol," by Pauline B. Mackie, are three good, short stories. In the department of the magazine headed "Between You and Me," Charlotte Perkins Stetson conducts an amusing chapter showing the various way in which man and woman are "Seen in Proverbs." "His Laddie's Easter Awakening" is an exceptionally touching story, by Emerine Stratton Rees.

A. D. Worthington & Co., publishers, Hartford, Conn.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE for April opens with a breezy article from Robert Blum, "An Artist in Japan." The illustrations, which are many and fine, are by the author, who traveled with diary and sketch book close at hand. "Unpublished Letters of Carlyle" were furnished to the magazine by the daughter of David Hope, a Glasgow merchant, who was one of Carlyle's intimate friends. Frances Hodgson Burnett's delightful "Memory," "The One I Knew Best of All," is continued through chapters eleven and twelve, and all readers of the quaintly humorous and often humorously pathetic narrative will only be regretful when it draws to a close. Stephen T. Aveling is the author of a very interesting description of "The Restoration House." He draws attention to the fact that in "Great Expectations" Charles Dickens describes this old mansion as Satis House and as inhabited by Miss Havisham. Also that if the "next" chapter of "Edwin Drood" had been written Restoration House would have been introduced. The old house was recalled from its lapse into disuse and decay in 1876 and the author tells a ghost story in which the moaning troubled spirit was resolved at last into aërated water in pipes hidden under the floors. The above named articles are not half the rich contents of this highly esteemed monthly.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City.

In the POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY for April, Maud Wilder Goodwin has a strong setting forth of the question touching the "Education of our Colored Citizens." In addition to a general survey of the ground, she gives as illustration of what has been and what can be done, a comprehensive glance at the Hampton school, an outgrowth of General Armstrong's thought for the freedmen. In closing her article the author says: "This is a great national question. It intimately concerns the white population at the South, whose welfare, whether they will or not, is bound up with that of the blacks, so that the sarcastic advice, 'Educate your masters!' becomes literal counsel of the truest and wisest kind, nor are we of the North indifferent observers. So bound together is this nation by the iron bands of railroads and telegraph wires that the issue of affairs in the South is of vital interest to us. Let it not be said of the thinkers of to-day as of those blind ones who watched the condition of France before the Revolution, that the philosophers were duller than fribbles. Let us clearly recognize the difficulty and complexity of the problem with which we have to deal, and then let us address ourselves to its solution soberly, earnestly and unremittingly."

TONY, THE ARISTOCRAT.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

A ragged old overcoat, buttoned up closely under a pair of prominent ears, and flapping against a pair of worn-out, cast-off, ill-matched shoes; a raggeder cap, with a stray wisp of reddish hair sticking impertinently out through a rip in the crown; a queer sort of young-old face, dirty, freckled and thin; two eyes of a greenish-gray color, small, squinting and overhung by old-looking eyebrows; an insignificant nose of the pug variety; a pair of puckered-up lips holding between them the stub of some one's cast-away cigarette, behold him—Tony, the Aristocrat!

It was a strange thing, a wonderful thing, how the boy had ever acquired the title. Certainly it was not by reason of any personal beauty he possessed, nor by elegance of attire. There were other ragamuffins in Hoodlum Alley far better dressed than Tony, and, as for looks, any boy in the alley could go ahead of him.

Perhaps it was his majestic way of carrying himself about the streets, the lordly manner of wearing his ragged overcoat, the rakish tip he gave his well-ventilated cap. Perhaps it was the inimitable way in which a discarded cigarette received its second smoking at his hands. At any rate, though no one ever knew just why it was, it was surely the case that Tony, of Hoodlum Alley, was popularly called among the street Arabs, "Tony, the 'Ristercrat."

That Tony liked the title was evident. He had a certain royal way of patronizing the small boys when he chanced to hear them call him that—a fatherly pat on the head, or a friendly kick, or the offer of a "light," which the "little kids" felt honored to receive.

"Tell ye what 'tis, fellers," he would say as a prelude to a dry-goods box lecture such as he was fond of giving to his always attentive and admiring audience, "they ain't no kids nowheres that comes up to the kids in this here alley! As fer looks—I'm a specimen o' what this alley kin turn out in that line—an' yer all good-lookin' too, every kid of yer—a good lookin' lot o' kids as I ever see in my daily walks, by Jupe!" (The way in which Tony the aristocrat rolled out his favorite "swear word" was the admiration of his friends and the envy of his enemies.)

"They ain't a thing worth knowin' that us fellers ain't up to, you bet. They ain't no smarter or selecter circle in all this here city than we be, an' don't ye forgit it. We're the top o' the heap, an' no one dassent say we ain't, dast they?"

Then would resound excited cries on every side—"No, they dassent!" "Let 'em if they dast!" "Tony, the Ristercrat, forever!" "Tony's the stuff!" "Long live Tony!"

Tony was very popular. Some aristocrats are not, strange to say, but Tony was. Of course he had enemies. What great man has not? It is a sign of consequence to have them, and Tony, knowing this, would have hung his head in shame had there been no boy whose head he felt he had a just right to punch.

There were newsboys who hated him because of his never-failing "luck." His very impudence and audacity won for him customers who paid and stayed, and friends too, sometimes, among the "big-bugs."

It all served to exalt him in his own opinion, in that of his admirers, and in that even of his enemies though they hated him for it.

"Tony, the 'Ristercrat's, gettin' too flip for any use," Billy Jones remarked one day to a group of cronies. "We'll have to take some o' the starch outen him 'fore long, that's what we will. T'other day down street he come with that slick swagger o' his'n, with a buttonhole bouquet stuck onto his overcoat. Ye'd jest orter seen him—O agony! what a dandy he is, an' what a figger he cuts! Seen him on the Avenoo yes'day. Any one'd thought he was nephy ter Jay Gould, hisself, goin' to his unc' fer his check an' his blessin'! They ain't no use talkin'—us fellers'll have to lay fer him an' take some o' the high tone feelin' outen his hide,—they ain't no other way!"

And they did!

One dark night they waited for Tony, the Aristocrat, in a lonely place where the electric light did not penetrate. Sheltered behind a pile of boards and boxes they watched and waited for their victim.

He came that way at last, seeming to the hating eyes of his enemies more audaciously "flip" than ever. They watched his cigarette light coming down the shadowy street, and caught the peculiar scuff of his feet on the pavement; saw him throw away his stub with a haughty gesture, and heard him begin to whistle in a provokingly clear voice the first few notes of "Little Annie Rooney."

It was too much. They felt his superiority, thought how Hoodlum Alley regarded him as its hero, recalled in a flash the well merited punchings they had received at his fists, and remembered the cutting things he had said to them and the objectionable names he had called them.

Tony, the Aristocrat, never finished "Little Annie Rooney." The whistle stopped short in the middle of a high note. There was a rush, a scuffle, a muffled cry of rage and pain and defiance, a heavy fall, the sound of fast-retreating footsteps down the street,—and Tony, the Aristocrat, lay alone by the board piles, unconscious, his head bleeding, his papers torn and scattered, his piteous, helpless body lying as it had fallen, wrapped round and round in the ragged old overcoat.

At five o'clock the next morning, Dr. Servisse, returning home from a night call in the suburbs, came across the boy lying there.

A quick look, a spring from the carriage, a swift, strong pressure upon the grimy wrist, and Tony, the Aristocrat, was lifted in a pair of muscular arms and laid upon the carriage seat. Then the doctor drove home rapidly.

It was weeks before Tony recovered from the cowardly attack of his enemies. There were days of doubt, when the young doctor looked grave and anxious as he sat beside his charge and listened to his delirium.

"Evenin' papers—evenin' papers? Here you, mister, I know yer jist hankerin' fer the evenin' paper! Hello, there, Nixie, any luck? What's the row here? Moll, you stop lickin' Nelly or I'll—, say, kids, they ain't no alley in town as kin come up to us, by Jupe!"

And then he would moan in pain and look wildly about, and call out for the "feller as hit me to jest come on!"

The doctor's fastidious young wife thought the boy ought to be taken to the hospital—ought to have been taken there at first. Her fine sense of the fitness of things was shocked by this uncouth presence in her well ordered house, but the doctor, though he said little, had his own way in the matter, and Tony stayed.

It was a warm heart, full of a true, honest love for humanity that beat beneath the doctor's vest. This was his way of living the religion he professed. His wife had her ways too. Hers lay in vastly different directions—church-going, foreign-mission work and religious societies of various kinds. Perhaps we need all kinds to make the world go round.

But the doctor and his little daughter were practical. To them it was of vital importance that this little, unknown life should be won back to earth. Afterward—if there should be an afterward—it would be time enough to minister to the soul.

One morning, three weeks after Tony, the Aristocrat, had received his almost death blow, he suddenly opened his eyes and looked up into the sweetest child-face he had ever seen—a vision of a forehead pure as snow, a pair of eyes as blue as heaven, a tender little rosy mouth, and softly-rounded cheeks the color of wild roses.

"Be I dead an' gone to heaven?" he asked wonderingly, looking up into that bending face. "Be you an angil?"

The little maid laughed outright, such a sweet laugh; it was like tinkling water-drops falling into a silver basin.

"Why, no, boy!" she answered merrily, "I ain't an angel, and you ain't dead at all. You're 'live, 'cause my doctor-papa cured you. But there!" and she checked herself, laying one dimpled finger upon her lips. "My doctor-papa said I mustn't let you talk if you woke up, so I won't. He'll be here pretty soon. You can watch me dress Arabella if you want to, but you mustn't say one single teeney weeney word!"

So obediently Tony, the Aristocrat, greatly puzzled over his surroundings, but too weak to disobey his little nurse's orders, lay and looked on languidly at the dressing of Arabella. Occasionally Arabella's mamma gave him bits of information regarding this or that article of apparel as she proceeded with the doll's toilet.

He listened wonderingly, and before he knew what he was going to do, fell asleep again and slept peacefully for hours.

When Tony awoke the doctor was at his side. It was a kind face that bent above him—a face like the one he had seen upon first wakening—he knew at once that this was "Doctor-papa."

Day by day strength came back to the weakened, wasted body of Tony, the Aristocrat. Day by day the winsome Edith hovered about like a fairy doing little kindnesses and helping to pass the long hours away. Edith's stately mamma came into the room once in a while too, and looked at him curiously through her rimless eye-glasses. She was kind to him but it was not the kindness of the genial-hearted doctor and his little girl. The street Arab felt the difference and was always relieved when her pretty gown had vanished through the doorway.

EDUCATION is a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army.—Everett.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—A special telegram from Pittsburg, Pa., to a Chicago paper two weeks ago read thus:

Three little boys picked up on the street last night by the police were found to be unconscious and in a dying condition from the effects of liquor. The police patrol was summoned and they were taken to the station-house, where the surgeon worked some time before he was able to bring them to consciousness. One of them nearly died in a spasm before he could be relieved. They gave their names as Willie D——, aged seven years; James D——, aged eleven years, and Willie G——, aged twelve years. They refused to tell where they got the liquor and the police are investigating.

With feelings of sorrow in my heart, I read this over and tried to picture to myself the homes to which these boys belonged. Can you? Do you suppose they had happy homes and that they had been taught the dangers of dri..k? Perhaps they had been so taught and we can imagine the grief of their parents. Perhaps too, they had never heard that alcohol is a deadly poison but had been accustomed to seeing grown people all about them drinking. How did they get the liquor? I wondered, too, if this experience would not prove a lasting lesson to them to avoid all such drinks in future and if other boys and girls could not learn from this story, if in no other way, what dangerous effects are brought about by drinking.

Such sad things as these won't happen when the boys and girls of the great white-ribbon family have their way and alcohol is forever banished!

God speed the time!

Imitation is the Sincerest Flattery. Why is Pearline the mark for every soap powder, or so-called washing compound, which is brought out? Everything is called "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline. None of them say "better"—they cannot. They should not say "as good as"—they are not. The simple fact that Pearline is so largely imitated would be enough to prove it the best.

And when a poor washing compound can do so much damage, do you want anything but the best? 369 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

THE YOUNG CRUSADER FOR APRIL.

A bit of scenery in the wild mountain region of Colorado, with Robbie and his little sister Bess in the foreground, is the sketch which introduces the interesting story of "Easter in Shady Gulch," by Ivan Inkling, in the April Crusader.

"Perched on a little plateau under the pine trees was a cabin whose yellow logs, stripped of their bark, shone in the warm sunlight. In front of the cabin were beds of flowers, and climbing over the door and up to the roof, was the mountain clematis. There were rustic seats under the trees, and a spring curbed about with broken quartz. And in this cabin with their mamma lived Robbie and his little sister, Bess." So reads the story. It tells of a glad Easter time, and of the gratitude of rough men for the bit of home life given to them by one "little woman" of whom it could be truly said, "She hath done what she could."

Fifteen cents will secure for you The Young Crusader one year. The April number alone is worth that sum.

COLUMBUS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

"Columbus: and What He Found," is the result of several years' research on the part of its author, Mrs. Mary H. Hull, in her efforts to present the story to a circle of little ones. It is rich and charming in style, and was prepared under the supervision of kindergartners. The demand for this book is already great among teachers, since it is the only successful attempt at interpreting this great deed to the child. Price $1.

A CHANGE IN PRICE.

The price of the Total Abstinence Leaflets has been changed to 15c per 100. Unions will please take notice.

The sweetest story on earth, in all literature and for all time, is the story of the infant Jesus and His wonderful coming among men. More wonderful to children than fairyland and myth, if told correctly. "Child's Christ-Tales," by Andrea Hofer, has answered this need. In short, typical kindergarten stories the different points of the Christ-life are put into exquisite form. Sunday-school teachers will find this book just what they want in primary work. It is a precious gift for all time to a child and to a child lover. The stories will bear reading over and over, and may be interpreted for readers of all ages. This is the usual quality of kindergarten stories. See this little book and tell your friends of it, for it solves the problem of teaching the Christ-life to children. Price $1, cloth.

Signal Notes.

THE first scientific medical journal ever issued by women will be published in Ohio. All the work will be done by women.

THE total strength of the militia of the United States is one hundred and twelve thousand, four hundred and ninety-six.

IT is said that two thousand Waldensians from the Italian side of the Alps contemplate emigrating to the United States in the spring.

THE birth of a girl is considered such a misfortune among the Sicilian peasantry that a black flag is hung out of the window to announce the sad event.

THE Mohammedan residents of London recently gave a dinner in honor of the birthday of Mohammed, when all the toasts were drunk in temperance drinks.

THE London Times has recently enlisted the services of several lady contributors, one of whom is now traveling through Australia as a special correspondent of the paper.

THE German woman's library to be exhibited at the Columbian Exposition, contains three hundred and eleven volumes, representing the most famous works of German women, dead and living.

A "SIGN of the times" was shown at an annual dinner of a New York Republican club when an allusion to woman's suffrage being made, the five hundred leading men of the party present applauded heartily.

JAPANESE audiences are models of politeness. When the lecturer begins to speak he is greeted by a polite obeisance from every one in the audience, and when he concludes, another low bow from every one in the room says silently, "I thank you."

FORTY thousand little children in London go breakfastless to school. Delegates from the idle workingmen have petitioned the school boards to give the children food for the body as well as for the mind. Porridge can be provided at a cost of only a cent for each person.

IT IS a hopeful sign that in Berlin, the center of the military spirit, peace societies are being formed, including prominent people in their membership. Peace pamphlets are also being written and read, and thoughtful men are speaking out against the despotism of war.

WOMEN druggists are creating a discussion in France. The society for the amelioration of the position of women has decided to grant a scholarship annually to a woman student to enable her to pass the examination which would make her competent to dispense drugs.

THE tenth annual report of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor in New York state contains a great deal of original and interesting information. The wages of farm laborers show a steady decline from 1866 to 1879, when a slight advance was made. In the city of New York from 1880 to 1890, the number of employés increased 48.9 per cent, but the amount paid for labor 127.89 per cent, while the average earnings of workers increased 52.93 per cent. The complete prohibition of child labor is recommended and a better regulation of female labor. The total number of strikes in 1892 was 1,768, 596 of which were unsuccessful. The total number of persons involved in them was over twenty-five thousand.

The Mischief of a Name.

There can be scarcely any question but that the flippant name of "the Grip" has kept much deserved sympathy from those attacked with that epidemic, while it has also tended to make the sufferers much less concerned about themselves than they otherwise would be. The truth is that this disease is a most serious one, and many people have died because of their failure to appreciate the fact. Its greatest havoc is made among weak and aged people. For that distressing weakness which characterizes every genuine case of La Grippe, Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen is a specific. It offsets weakness with strength—with strength acquired in a natural way, and not by a temporary stimulant. Letters by the hundred prove this.

"DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—In April last I was suddenly prostrated with La Grippe, which developed heart failure. I was in a very critical condition; was reported dead. When the C. O. arrived I took it according to directions, and in fifteen days thereafter was riding a mowing machine. My strength came gradually and steadily; there was no pull-back. For several years I had been troubled with Constipation, but am not now. Can enjoy a good square meal, sleep well and can do a man's work. These blessings I now enjoy I ascribe to C. O. Treatment.

"M. W. HUNTINGTON, Jasper, N. Y."

People who wish to keep out or put out La Grippe, should write for further particulars to Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1 29 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Anarchists are active in Spain.

A new French cabinet has been formed by M. Charles Dupuy, M. Meline having been unsuccessful in the attempt.

Wind and rain storms of great violence were reported from Western New York, Indiana and Michigan last Saturday.

Prince Ferdinand, of Bulgaria, and Princess Marie Louise, of Bourbon, were married at Via Reggio, Italy, April 8.

The great Mormon Temple, which has been forty years in building, was formally dedicated at Salt Lake City, Utah, April 6.

The thermometer in Chicago registered 86 degrees at 3 p. m., April 7, the hottest weather so early in the season for twenty-three years.

A conference of delegates from state boards of health, discussing quarantine regulations, has just closed its sessions in New York City.

Forest fires have been doing great damage in Southern Ohio and Kentucky, and terrible prairie fires have been raging in South Dakota and Nebraska.

Dispatches from Honolulu this week announce the arrival there of the American commissioner, James Blount, and his warm reception by the residents.

The New York Historical Society celebrated April 8, the two hundredth anniversary of the introduction of the printing press into the colony of New York.

By the extension of the Panama concession, which is announced this week, twenty months are allowed for the organization of a new company and the renewal of work on the canal.

Twelve thousand barrels of whisky exploded and burned during a fire at Louisville, Ky., last week, the fumes being so intense that many persons were intoxicated by breathing them.

Reports from Berlin this week presage a cabinet crisis and a dissolution of the Reichstag to follow the second reading of the much discussed army bill, which occurs the middle of May.

The sixty-eighth anniversary of the American Tract society was held at Washington, D. C., April 9, the reports showing receipts from all sources during the past year, $375,000; 186 colporteurs in thirty-six states and territories have made 146,000 family visits and conducted religious services in 100,000 of these families, also circulated 121,452 volumes and addressed 5,419 public religious meetings.

THE regular quarterly meeting of the W. T. P. A. will be held in the manager's office, The Temple, Chicago, at ten o'clock, Wednesday, April 19.

MRS. L. S. ROUNDS, president of Illinois W. C. T. U., returned from Clifton Springs, New York, last week greatly improved in health, and after spending a few days in Chicago went out into her own state to answer many urgent calls.

ANOTHER state W. C. T. U. is in mourning. Miss L. Annette Northup, president of Wyoming, passed away to her heavenly reward, April 4. The state reporter writes: "I know not what we can do without her. We are indeed bereft." THE UNION SIGNAL extends cordial sympathy to the Wyoming sisters.

THE Bible recently went to the press in a new language, that of the Gilbert Islands, which are situated southeast of Asia on the equator. The Rev. and Mrs. Hiram Bingham began the translation in 1859 and have done most of the work. The proof of the last chapter was read on February 4.

THE "whisky crop" in Kentucky is reported to be double that of 1892, up to the present time reaching close to fifty millions of gallons. The amount of taxable spirits in this whisky producing state in 1892 numbered 116,813,364 gallons, paying the United States government $122,654,630.70 revenue. The corn-cracker state still deserves its old Indian appellation of "the dark and bloody ground."

THE Chicago Tribune reports that within the last six months 279 buildings, with a total of 33,945 rooms have been erected, or begun, for the accommodation of visitors to the Fair in what is called the World's Fair district, namely, in a district within walking distance of the Fair grounds. To this must be added private houses and hotels already within that region which will accommodate guests. It estimates that 100,000 people will be within walking distance of the grounds.

THE ingenuity of "the trade" has a fresh illustration in the backs of omnibus tickets in London. It is well known that as advertisers the Americans do not approach in constancy the English, which statement must be, we are aware, a heavy tax on the average credulity of the human mind, but turn where you will in England there is a displayed advertisement. An omnibus ticket recently used reads as follows on the back: "Robertson's Scotch Whisky at all Bars and Stores," and then comes with great exactitude the address, which, like all others in London, is somewhat complicated.

THE National-American suffrage headquarters at the World's Fair will be located in the Woman's Building within the Fair grounds. Here, from May to November, some one of a numerous committee will be found in daily attendance, to receive visitors, answer questions, distribute literature and arrange for subscriptions to native and foreign suffrage periodicals. But all meetings of a public character will be held in the new Art Institute, not within the Fair grounds, but on Adams Street and Michigan Avenue, near the center of the city, admission to all congresses, conferences, etc., being free.

THE school of Christian Workers, at Springfield, Mass., is unique in plan and successful in accomplishment. Through the kindness of the department of literature in the National W. C. T. U., an alcove in its library has received its first installment of temperance books. A friend writes: "Please accept our assurance that 'Childhood, Its Care and Culture,' shall be the focus of light for the Mary Allen West memorial temperance alcove." As others may like to join in this memorial, we suggest that any who wish to place temperance books or papers where they will be of service, correspond with the librarian of the school.

IN some particulars our English friends are in advance of us but in others far behind, so that it may be said in general terms as the opinion of experts there, that calling one hundred the desired standard of temperance work, America may be represented on that scale by forty, and England by fifteen; while among the women workers in respect to what they have accomplished, America would be represented by ninety and England by fifteen. In England you will see the driver in his cab drinking a pot of beer handed up to him for that purpose. Christmas and the New Year with the intervening days are given over to such freedom in respect to drinking as is wholly unknown in the United States. As a rule not a drop of water is to be had at the railway stations.

THE Central W. C. T. U. of Chicago is strengthening its forces for preventive and rescue work during this World's Fair summer. Being confident that many young girls will be in danger of falling into evil hands upon arrival in the city, the Central union has decided to station big-hearted, prudent women, decorated with a large metal badge, at the various stations to look after inexperienced women and girls, and direct them to reliable boarding-houses and hotels. It will not be enough to place a white ribbon upon these women as that badge is easily procured and will doubtless be worn to deceive. The metal badge will resemble a policeman's star and will be large and plain enough to attract attention and secure confidence. In order to carry on this preventive work on anything like an adequate scale, large sums of money will be required, and we earnestly entreat every humanity loving man and woman of means to contribute to this noble fund. Mrs. Robert L. Greenlee, treasurer of the Central union, room 1101, The Temple, Chicago, will receive and acknowledge all donations.

CARTER HARRISON was elected mayor of Chicago, April 4. It is a calamity which was not expected, as it was believed that the righteous vote of the city would outweigh the unrighteous. We still believe it would have done so had the righteous all voted. There were nearly fifty thousand less votes than registered names. Had one-half of these voted on the side of municipal reform, Harrison would have been defeated, for he had less than twenty thousand majority. It is safe to assume that all the gamblers and saloon-keepers and proprietors of every vile den in the city voted for the "boss candidate," and the orgies carried on the night after election in the purlieus of South Clark street would have put to shame the denizens of a Hottentot village. And still many "good Republicans" will excuse their failure to vote because there were two "dreadful Democrats" on the Citizens' ticket, and "loyal Democrats" of the better class explain their support of a notoriously evil candidate by saying "he was the regular nominee of my party!" Such excuses in the light of decent municipal government for the World's Fair City are contemptible beyond credence. But Chicago has started well on the road to non-partisan politics, and we predict a different result in the election two years hence.

LAST week we gave a few utterances of the secular press of Chicago commending the management of the Temperance Temple. Since then almost every paper in the city, both daily and weekly, has given in no uncertain way, ringing indorsements of this great building and its dauntless builder. We quote here a few sentences from some of the leading religious journals. Says the Advance, the great Congregational organ, "One of the noblest buildings in Chicago is the Woman's Temperance Temple. It was a grand idea, that of giving to the great cause of temperance, in the heart of Chicago, a 'local habitation' and a majestic and beautiful outward symbol of its power. It was also a sagacious business idea to have such a structure, the income from which in the years to come should be a perpetual means towards the support of the great publishing and other agencies found to be most efficient in promoting the cause of temperance throughout the world. It was a sublime thought to have so many thousands of the friends of temperance unite in its ownership, as a kind of visible token of their union in the great cause which must more and more enlist the deep devotion of all Christian people." The well-known Presbyterian journal, The Interior, says: "If Mr. Hobbs or his friends have any property or other rights in peril, the courts are open to them. If they have not, his attack will naturally lead people to inquire for his motive. What has he to gain by seeking through the newspapers to destroy public confidence in the Temple management?" Such are the editorial sentiments of first-class journals the country over, and such the spoken sentiments of thousands of friends of the cause.

PROGRESS.

BY ARTHUR E. JOHNSON.

The clod said to the mustard seed:
"You cannot, shall not grow;
Your sphere is not in heaven's free air,
But in the earth below."

What did the little mustard seed?
It did the best it knew;
Filled with a consciousness of power,
Made no reply—but grew.

So said blind leaders of the blind
To woman. But God rules,
And woman took her rightful place
In social life and schools.

Much yet remains. The mustard seed
Has not yet filled the earth.
But in the coming years I see
The triumph of true worth.

I see the reign of truth and love
Extend from pole to pole;
By woman's hand this standard raised—
Twin purity of soul.

WIN ONE.

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON.

Katherine Brooks belonged to the Win One Chapter. She had worn her little silver cross a whole year before she had heard of this branch of the order's work. She was young and so brave and bright that everybody thought her pretty. She was out of school now, and the circle to which she belonged at —— Seminary was scattered. It had been a very lovely tie that bound them, and the little meetings in the upper room of the class building had been very sweet, and the girls had tried more or less earnestly to do the school work In His Name. The teachers would have said the order's influence in the school was good. There was more courtesy, less slang, less snubbing of the poorer and more helpfulness toward the duller girls. Of course, it must have meant that there was more sweetness and patience and tenderness on the inside, or these outward signs must have failed, for the spring is no sweeter than its source.

Be that as it might, for good or evil, that life was over now. Kate was "in society," but somehow there had dropped out of its daily round of pleasant occasions the music of His Name. She went faithfully to church—it had been the habit of the family life. She laughed and sang and chatted and flirted through days that were crowded with social pleasures.

She wore the little cross when she did not forget it, or was not too hurried in dressing to remember it, and she still said her prayers—rather sleepy ones, to be sure—before she closed her eyes at night. Everything looked well, and certainly everything would have been well but for an undercurrent of unrest and dissatisfaction beneath all the sparkling surface of her life. She did not know, dear child, that it was the angel of God gently stirring the waters of her soul, and for the same reason that He sent an angel to trouble the pool of Bethesda.

She did not understand yet that the troubling of the waters meant the cleansing of the waters, and that the reason why God could not be content to have them stagnant and impure, was that there were sick souls who needed the healing that pure hearts always bring to those they take into their tenderness, wrapping them round with love as the waters enfolded those who stepped within the pool.

There was a good deal beside that the young wearer of the cross had not yet learned, but her Teacher, who is not impatient, and who is never in a hurry, did not forget her, though He saw her drifting through the pleasures of her New York visit, without very many thoughts of Him.

It was Lent, but Lent is not a very somber time in New York, and the service every day did not shut out the gayety of every night. There was a good deal to enjoy, and Katherine enjoyed it to the full until the angel sent of God stirred to their depths the waters of her life.

It was a breezy March evening and Cousin Tom had promised to take her to the theatre. It was Lent, but then it was early, and, by and by, certainly in Holy Week, she meant to be very strict indeed. Besides she was not often in New York and Tom was so busy with all his clubs and things that he was not always available as an escort, and since Tom was a little inclined to be wild it was only right that she should please him lest she should lose all influence over him for good.

All this went through her mind as she adjusted her hat and drew on her gloves. As she gathered up the lace at her throat and took up the little pin which she usually wore at her throat, her eye caught the flash of its pendant, her little silver cross. For an instant she hesitated, then with an impatient gesture she quickly detached it and dropped it into the little jewel box. "It isn't a bit of use to try to wear it always! It isn't suitable, anyway, when one is dressed; it should be of pearls or something less conspicuous and plain. Besides, Tom hates it. He thinks it is only a fad and I know he wouldn't like to see it to-night," and she ran down to him as fresh and lovely a creature as one could wish to see.

They reached the theatre.

"What's this?" said Tom, observing that as large a throng seemed to be moving away from the place as was moving toward it. "What is the matter?"

"No performance to-night. Leading lady fell down in a faint in the green room. They have found out that she is dead. Heart gave out all in a minute," said another, "and there was no one to take her place."

The crowd increased and before Tom could force his way out, an ambulance rolled slowly away from the side entrance and Kate shuddered at the outline of a human form that filled her vision for a moment as it passed.

"Never mind, Coz," said Tom cheerily. "Let's try another place. We can't have such ghastly luck again. It's very inconsiderate of the woman to choose just the night to make her exit when we wanted to be amused."

"Hush, Tom! How can you joke in sight and sound of such a dreadful thing!"

"I'm not joking; I am only trying to keep my pretty cousin from hysterics over a person not worth a thought."

"She was a woman, Tom."

"Yes, but what a woman! She drank like a fish, and off the stage she smoked and swore. Her pretty daughter is on the stage, too, and I heard Dick Elwood say she was coming on the same way. She was to dance and sing to-night. I wish you had seen her; she looks a little bit like you. But where shall we go, Kate?"

"Nowhere, Tom, thank you. I really don't feel like being amused any more."

They were passing an entrance on Forty-second street. A light streamed out on the pavement, a chorus of many voices, some manly and loud, some womanly, but not very sweet, was singing heartily. The words broke strangely upon Kate's ear, as if from another world—quite unlike this thronged and lighted street. She paused involuntarily.

"Rescue the perishing, care for the dying,
Snatch them in pity from sin and the grave."

"It's Saint B——'s Rescue Mission. Want to go in?"

"No." But as they passed on the words rang after her:

"Care for the erring ones, tenderly lead them.
Jesus is merciful, Jesus will save."

"Yes, Tom, let us go in. I—I want to see what it is like."

And it was like nothing she had ever seen or heard. There were men and women, too, with sin-scarred faces and work-grimed hands speaking with tears of the power to save that was holding them back from the pit. There were young men, even lads, bloated and blear-eyed. There were women and girls, too, whose faces wore the mark of many an evil day; and some of these prayed and praised and pleaded for and with others, coming tremblingly and half blindly to One who was mighty to save.

There were ladies there, gentle of face and voice, and a Great-Heart of a leader, who having been saved from drink and sin himself, seemed to have but one thought, and that how to rescue the perishing. And he talked in the simplest way of the Win One Chapter, of the order to which Kate belonged. The little cross was on his watch-chain.

"It is one of the sweetest privileges Christ gives us," he said, "that of sharing His blessed work. His heart is loving, bent on saving, and He divides up the precious wanderers, as it were, and says to you and to me: 'Find one. Bring one home to my fold and to Me, the Shepherd. Each of you who love Me, prove it by seeking and loving and bringing one back to my heart.' There is only one way to win them. Only one road by which they will come. Go into their wilderness after them, and be to them what Christ was to the friend beloved. They may come up out of the wilderness then leaning on your arm and your heart, and so find their way even into His heart which yearns over them, waits for them—waits for us to bring them one by one."

The words were very simple. Kate knew it all before, but this touched her strangely. Life looked so real and so sad from this new outlook that showed her how near to each other walked death and pleasure, how hard life must have been to souls like these gathered in this place; how different from any life she knew about or could share. As she listened her eyes softened with tears, her heart with prayers that seemed to fill it for these, the wretched, the sinning, the weak for whom her Master cared enough to die. If He could die surely she might live to help Him in his His work of saving them. Perhaps she could win one.

And suddenly there rose before her vision a face that Tom had said was a little like her own, the face of the motherless girl who was going, as he said, the same way the mother went. Perhaps—perhaps—who knew? He, the Christ who loved her would let her help win this one, this one, already wandering "Away on the mountains wild and bare, away from the tender Shepherd's care." Her mother was dead, poor child. Perhaps there was no one to care very much. Perhaps God would show her how to let her know she cared. It is too long a story to tell the wondrous way He showed her how.

She could not go to seek the child of the dead actress, but she told her story to a woman who went for her, and they came together in that woman's home, the fair "society girl" and the motherless dancer, whose face as it looked out from the black veil was sad and as sweet as Katherine's own.

"This is the young friend who was at the theatre the night your mother died, and whose heart has been so touched by your sorrow that she wants to know you better," said the woman friend, who was wise enough then to go away and leave the two girls alone.

And they became friends, and through the dear Lenten days they sat often in some dim church at the vesper service that was at first only a soothing hour in a peaceful spot, whose chief charm to the orphan girl was that she could be there by Katherine's side.

But Katherine's earnest-hearted prayers accompanied as they were with the marks, not of missionary condescension, but of friendliness, real and strong, could not fail to be felt. And by and by the dim church became the place where two prayed and where two hearts united in the purpose to go forth and help the Master to bring another and another home to the heart of God.

When Easter morning came and Katherine was ready, radiant as any bright blossom of spring, and cousin Tom waited with his hat to go to church with her, she said:

"Excuse me, Tom, but I want to go with Agnes; it is her first communion, you know."

"No, I didn't know," he answered, thoughtfully, "but I did know how you have been giving yourself to the saving of that girl, and I thought I'd like to tell you, Kate, that watching you and seeing what religion meant to you, although I rebelled a bit at first, has made a new man of me. I have been thinking, too, of that time when I was a Christian, before I went to college. I'd like to help some of the fellows up that are down. I can't talk much about it, Kate, but I suspect that while you thought you were winning one you have been winning two."

Tears of joy watered the lilies on Katherine's breast as she knelt at the altar with Agnes that day, for when his parents moved forward from the old family pew she saw that Tom went too. As he turned away from the table of the Lord, the table neglected since he was a lad, she caught upon his watch-chain the shine of a little cross.

New York City.

PRACTICAL REMEDIES AGAINST INTEMPERANCE.

BY REV. J. H. ECOB. D. D.

[From Address before Congregational Club, New York City.]

There is in that word practical, a covert impeachment of the prevailing doctrines and methods of temperance reformers. It says in effect theories are chimerical, methods ineffectual. What we want is good, plain, hard sense, and methods that rational people can apply at once with directness and vim. The great and good public is like an army in the trenches waiting day after day, till waiting is unbearable, to be "up and at them." Every now and then some would-be leader rushes to the front, waves a brand-new sword aloft and cries, "Forward!" There is a grand rush, and much noise and smoke, and cries all along the line, "The enemy is ours!" But when the noise and smoke drift away you look and behold all things remain as they were, except that a few lose heart and faith and drop to the rear as mere camp followers.

I tell you frankly, friends, I do not rally any more "worth a cent." After twenty years of steady campaigning I am simply "a sadder and a wiser man." I know of no new doctrines, no short-cut methods, nothing which would be called practical by the man of hard sense (which, by the way, is about the poorest sense in the world. Hard sense means ossified brain.) My own experience has been, in microcosm, a history of the temperance reform. I began with a set of very respectable notions, and stood in eminently respectable society. I had "calm" views, "good-creature-of-God" views, "temperance-and-not-total-abstinence" views and that sort of thing, you know. This I now regard as the measles and whooping-cough period. Well, I got safely through these infantile diseases, then came the green period, the gawky, the fresh period. Temperance fads were as irresistible as new neckties to a college freshman. "Restriction, not prohibition." "Reduce the number of saloons per capita of the population." "Displace the saloon by the coffee-house and the amusement hall." High license above all the rest, was the practical, hard-sense method. I quoted with gusto Emerson's sounding but delusive words, "Make the backs of your vices bear the burden of your taxes." I should judge by the symptoms that good Dr. Rainsford had just about reached this fresh period. Poor fellow, I know just how he feels. He reminds me of a scene on the campus at Oberlin. A trench was being dug. The calm and self-contained Hibernian was removing the earth with his well-known steady and patient swing, rather more patient than steady. Professor Morgan stopped to contemplate the scene. He gazed till his heart burned within him. Then suddenly leaping into the ditch: "Here, give me that shovel." For a moment the dirt flew as if the well-known "iron-wooden shovel" were after it. Then climbing out in breathless exhaustion: "There, that's the way to shovel!" The philosopher of the trenches eyed him compassionately a moment, then quietly remarked: "Ah, Misther Perfessor, that's momenturry, that's momenturry." So our good rector climbs out of the trenches panting "church saloon." Ah, Brother Rainsford, "that's momenturry, that's momenturry." He has such good stuff in him that this necktie period will not last very long. He will feel better when he gets his second wind. I predict that some of you will yet see him writing fast and furious editorials for The Voice.

Well, these childish things being put away, and having become a man, what then? Why, nothing is left but the Prohibitionist, pure and simple. Having worked clear of all these foreign and deleterious substances, behold the residuum—clear crank! "Here I stand, I cannot otherwise. God help me, amen."

Now the question arises, have we any use for this one-horned, uncompromising, cantankerous creature, this moral unicorn, the Prohibitionist. He is evolved, what is to be done with the evolution?

The Prohibitionist is called of God to be the conscience of the temperance reform. He bears all the ear-marks of a conscience. He can never be silenced, never convinced. He will have a whole loaf or no bread. His judgment is the same before your argument as after it. He has but one cry and no language but this cry: "Sin, sin, sin."

In every individual, in every institution, in every nation, you can fix the moral status by observing the number and the character of the prohibitions carried and established by conscience. In every case it is simply a question, How large, and what is the nature of your prohibition territory? At first, beginning between savage and savage, it was a question of personal rights, on a purely physical basis. The savage, like the animal, has very little beside the territory of his own body. In that territory conscience staked out its first claim. It was prohibition territory. Thou shalt not kill thy brother.

The savage would first respect the persons of his own family, then of his band, then of his tribe, then of his allies, and then—well, we will tell you what then when the Christian nations disarm. Even this first prohibition state of conscience is not very large nor very secure, when Herr Krupp is about to bring the biggest human slaughtering machine in the world to our Columbian Exposition. Bah, the savagery of Christian nations, and Christ has been in the world two thousand years!

The next prohibition state established by conscience was, Right of Property. Thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not take by violence, or by fraud, that which is thy brother's. This state is the largest, most clearly defined in the world to-day. It lies so close to self-interest, that men have informed their conscience, and made careful definitions, and cut the boundary lines deep. Let a tramp steal from me the value of a copper and I can array against him the whole mechanism of government. If I cry, "Stop thief!" the busiest man on the street is at once a vigilance committee. The huge policeman pacing in innocuous desuetude before saloons and brothels and gambling hells is instanter a "terror to evil-doers," and racing down the street in hot pursuit. The courts are at my disposal. The jails fly open at my command.

Now perhaps you expect me to go on mapping out and naming other prohibition states under conscience. I wish I could. Would to God I could cry: "All the kingdoms of the world have become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ." But they have not. I say it with an inward groan, the United States of conscience consists this day of two well defined states, viz., Rights of Person and Rights of Property, and round about them a vast, undefined territory, some of which is nearly ready to be admitted to the Union, some of it dotted with here and there a settler, and then the interminable, moral wilderness. This is not saying that in individuals, in communities, in Christian nations even, there is no conscience on other and higher matters. I am only saying that on these other and higher matters conscience has not yet conquered sufficiently large territory, and made so complete a conquest that the moral right is publicly recognized, and expressed in common custom, and in operative laws. Why, even to-day in Christendom, society, trade and the national relations are all based on the animal, savage code of competition, instead of the rational, moral Christ code of coöperation.

Against any great evil in a community the forces are drawn up in this order. Immediately confronting the evil, on the very battle's edge is a comparatively small company of men whose consciences are perfectly clear. With them all doubt and debate are at an end. They have but one cry, so intense and relentless that it falls on duller consciences like a storm of hail: Sin! sin! sin! War to the knife and no quarter. These are the radicals, the fanatics, the cranks, the fools, God's fools, who "turn the world upside down."

Back of these is the great host of the eminently respectables, good souls, well-meaning men with half-informed consciences, timid, conservative, inclined to calmness and particularly given to hard sense. Among them originate all the compromises, the make-shifts, the substitutes, the half measures. They love to pass resolutions, and if they get as far as "ringing resolutions," they seem to think that the walls of Jericho have forgotten their ancient manners if they do not instantly fall flat. Back of this half-converted host stretches the great mass of the indifferent, shading off into the blackness of darkness and the shadow of death. This is the order of battle. Now comes the process. The conscience, that little band of radicals and cranks down at the front, keeps up an incessant racket. They rest not day nor night. They run to and fro discussing, declaring, hurling firebrands of incendiary literature right and left. They hold forlorn little meetings in most unheard-of places, but manage to so stir things up that their little place becomes suddenly interesting as a house afire. They define, explain, teach, exhort. They drag us poor, limp ministers out of our "splendidly null" pulpits, and when we get down into their inflammable atmosphere, before we know it we have used "injudicious language." And when a minister reaches that point his course is rapidly downward. He is soon shouting and waving a torch with the worst of them. He is at last among the prophets. So by degrees the conservatives are won over and catch the divine madness until conscience has an irresistible host under command. It moves steadily on to the occupation of the conquered territory, and then follow the more peaceful tasks of clarifying conviction, establishing customs and framing righteous, efficient laws. What the Abolitionist was to slavery, that the Prohibitionist is to strong drink—a sleepless, remorseless conscience with a naked sword in hand smiting in the name of God.

You need not attempt persuasion with him, saying, Why so radical, so pushing, so obstreperous? You might as well suggest to an intensely interested hornet that he be content with the buzzing of his wings and not fall back upon his other resources. The Prohibitionist knows that the sting of death is sin, if you will forgive this mild wresting of Scripture. When this Prohibition hornet begins to circulate his compliments, "sin, sin," the crowd is bound to take unwonted interest in him.

Here, also, we find the Prohibitionist's inability to join with other reformers in the various movements put forward in the name of temperance. He will accept everything that has prohibition in it in esse or in posse. But he rejects with righteous scorn any plan which acknowledges even indirectly the right of existence to the liquor traffic. In this position he is as helpless as the ten commandments. Having uttered an eternal "No," he cannot utter a little temporary "Yes," for a consideration. Thou shalt have no other gods before me "e-except—a graven image or two at a shekel a head. Try high license and bid two shekels." In this presence license is blasphemy. "Thy money perish with thee."

All schemes of mere mechanical restriction, like the Minneapolis plan, or the Gothenburg scheme of merely shuffling drinks, so to speak, meet the same contemptuous rejection, for the same reason. In all such plans there is no recognition of the essential moral evil of the drink traffic, no movement in the direction of its final extinction. Such methods proceed on the assumption that the saloon and its belongings are an annoyance, a nuisance, and, like slaughter houses, bone bleacheries, and other such unpleasant neighbors, we respectables prefer to have the saloons beyond the reach of our moral olfactories. All such schemes are wanting in the vital element of conscience. We prophesy the day when all this temporizing and playing with this sin of sins will be read by the enlightened conscience of the Christian world as we read the ancient story of the dancing around a golden calf at the foot of Sinai.

The Prohibitionist is also very zealous, intelligent and pushing in the matter of teaching the truth. He knows well that an ignorant conscience is simply a blind Samson. When we are inclined to criticism or despair at the apparently slow progress of the temperance reform we will do well to remember the silent yet potent forces that are at work. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is filling the land with the outstretching rootlets of its organization. Books, periodicals, papers, tracts, leaflets, mottoes, pictures are multiplied like the leaves of the forest. And every leaf from that organization, thank heaven, bears an echo of the great central conscience, prohibition. Nearly every state in the Union now compels its children to be taught the rudimentary truths respecting intemperance. Our Sunday-school programs are punctuated with temperance lessons. Our religious papers must have their temperance columns.

By no means the least of the unpardonable sins of the Prohibitionist is his institution of the Third Party. But pray, what else could he do? What sort of a conscience would he be to say No every day in the year except election day, and then go to the polls and cast a ballot that at one fell swoop wipes out the entire record of the year. The Prohibitionist is nothing if not consistent: "Oh, I know of course that consistency is the bugbear of small souls." I know that consistency is likewise the backbone of the law of gravitation. The stars in their courses fight for it. Four millions of Christian voters is a goodly army. The sight of it should rout pessimism from the faintest heart. But to see that God's host every year in the decisive hour of battle falter and break up, and desert to the enemy is one of the most portentious prophecies of the times. Believe me, the little handful of conscience-votes is not "thrown away," but planted in God's name. "A handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon."

Last but not least the Prohibitionist believes in, teaches, votes for woman's suffrage. "Yes," exclaims a chorus of voices, "and that is the capsheaf of his absurdities and follies, to load down the temperance cause with so many fanatical notions. That is just why so many strong, intelligent people wash their hands of the whole thing." Very well, as I have told you again and again, he does not ask your approval, he does not notice your censure. He is a conscience. Does your conscience consult with you as to what it shall approve or condemn? I tell you, friends, seriously, I have come to hold in great respect the instincts of a radical, self-denying, God-fearing reformer. I have ceased to desire to lop off his idiosyncracies and make a sleek, tame creature of him just like all his conservative, domesticated neighbors. Let him alone, give him his head. Like the prophets of old, he declares many strong things and does unexpected, peculiar things which need interpretation, but all the time he is driven of the Spirit. We call him insane; but the insanity of the prophets is only the sanity of the gods incarnate.

Why should it be thought a thing incredible that the Prohibitionist should seek woman's suffrage? Like is drawn to like. Being a conscience, he is drawn to that great untainted, unsophisticated woman's conscience, which, after all, is the divine leaven of the nation. He would arm this conscience with that last terrible weapon of Christian citizenship, the ballot. We believe, and all the signs of the times declare, that he is taught of God in this thing. "The foolishness of God is wiser than men."

We will witness many an advance and retreat, alternate victories and defeats, for this is a long and desperate struggle. We shall witness the rise and fall of many devices. New leaders will rush to the front with new and alluring plans of campaign; the multitude will run after them for a day; the love of many will wax cold; iniquitous laws will be passed. But upon one thing we may rest with perfect assurance. The Prohibitionist will be always with us, and what is better, he must, from the nature of the case, be always the same. Not one of his spots will change. While he abounds, this, our great adversary, will not be wanting in a true and stalwart foe. Neither will our stall-fed conventional respectability ever suffer for lack of a thorn in the flesh.

Albany, N. Y.

THE MINISTRY OF SONG.

BY ALICE J. HARRIS.

It may appear at first glance, as we look over the forty different lines of work pursued by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, that every possible means for the reformation and uplifting of humanity is being utilized by that comprehensive organization. Yet, from my standpoint, one of the mightiest forces for good, oftentimes more potent than the most eloquent sermon, is being comparatively unused by the great body of workers of the W. C. T. U. I refer to the power of gospel temperance music.

In the use of the phrase "comparatively unused," I do not forget that almost every meeting is opened and closed with congregational singing, or that the programs of our special meetings—anniversaries, conventions, etc., are liberally sprinkled with music of one sort or another; but we have not yet fully comprehended the fact, that truth may reach the hearts of the multitude through the medium of song as readily as that of speech.

From the days of old, when David exhorted all humanity to "sing unto the Lord a new song; sing praises unto Him with the timbrel and harp, praise Him with stringed instruments and organs," when, amid all the directed details of the building of that marvelous sanctuary of God, the Temple of Solomon, we find special provision made for the music thereof (think what a superb choir of male voices, "two hundred and fourscore and eight"), down to the present day music has been a recognized factor in the forces that make for righteousness.

How largely the Gospel Songs, that have been from the first a special feature of Mr. Moody's meetings, have contributed to his unparalleled success in winning souls to Christ, who can say? It is undoubtedly true that there are those—and they are many—who sit unmoved under the most powerful appeals of oratory, but whose hearts yield to the tender influence of song as readily as ice melts before the genial sun.

In the great work done for the Master by the Salvation Army, music, both vocal and instrumental, has had prominent part. As the first Napoleon infused life and hope into his starving, freezing, dying army on the retreat from Moscow by ordering the drums beaten and the trumpets blown, so has this peaceful army aroused the hope of eternal life in the hearts of the downtrodden, the discouraged and the sinful. They have gone into the by-ways and the slums, and by their soul-stirring songs, their hallelujah choruses, their cymbals and tambourines, have awakened, first, curiosity, then attention, and finally, the way having been thus opened to a hearing, they have dispensed Christ's healing truth to the saving of multitudes.

In my own limited experience, I have known a number of individual instances of men brought up into the dignity and nobility of Christian manhood from the depths of sin and debauchery, through the influence of a simple, touching song. I have learned that oftentimes a temperance song has this advantage over an address; the truth in it touches the heart of the hearer unawares, when he is not on the defensive against all argument.

Some one has said: "Songs are the highways of angels to human hearts"; and again: "True song is a gush of feeling, and is, therefore, moral education in its purity." That skillful analyst of human character, Shakespeare, said: "He who has no music in his soul, or is not moved by concord of sweet sounds, is fit for treason, stratagem and spoils; let no such man be trusted." If, then, the human heart is so susceptible to the divine influence of melody, should we not, as an organization, as "we wage our peaceful war," utilize this weapon far more effectively than we have yet done?

Here is an especial field wherein our Y's may render effective aid, for in these days of universal culture the great majority of young women are, in some degree, accomplished in the arts of vocal or instrumental music. How wonderfully helpful in Christian temperance work our young people might be who would combine to form choruses, or single quartets, trios or duets, prepare for good work by frequent rehearsals, then carry the message of gospel temperance on the wings of song to our missions, prisons and hospitals, or infuse new courage into the hearts of our own workers by suitable and soul-stirring numbers in our own meetings.

I wish I might obtain the ear of all such as are moved to lay upon the altar their gift of song, to whisper two suggestions. First, let your selections be appropriate in sentiment to the occasion. How often does it occur in our public meetings that a solo is rendered as foreign in sentiment to the subject under consideration as "Annie Rooney" or "Sweet Violets"! What sense of the eternal fitness of things must be wanting in the soloist who selects an aria from "Carmen" to sing at a temperance meeting, even though given with the wealth of voice and accomplishment of a Patti. Our own Mrs. Barnes tells of one occasion when her address upon "Young Woman's Work," was preceded by a song entitled, "Take Me in Your Arms and Kiss me, Love"!

My second suggestion is, enunciate distinctly. How often do we hear it said: "A beautiful voice, a lovely melody, but—she might as well have sung in Greek!" A just criticism. If it be your mission to convey temperance truth through the channel of song, let the sentiment be clearly understood; otherwise your effort goes for naught.

I would by no means confine musical service to the soloist, quartet or chorus, though these may be judiciously introduced at intervals at every meeting; but each union should, as a whole, "make melody with the voice to the Lord." Cultivate this comparatively unused agency of song, which may be as much a means of reform and regeneration as preaching or prayer; provide the union with books; if necessary, pay a competent leader to teach new selections; give an occasional praise service, where music will be the dominant feature of the program; and as music and temperance thus go hand in hand, each strengthening the other, a tremendous quickening of the work will surely follow.

I cannot close this article without a reference to the various excellent temperance song books compiled by Miss Anna A. Gordon, and published by the W. T. P. A. In past years it has been most difficult to obtain good temperance music. In one of the largest music publication houses in the country, I have been repeatedly told: "There is very little good temperance music composed; it is mostly trash." Happily, however, we have within our own ranks one who not only understands the musical needs of our work, but is able and willing to supply them to a large extent; and in the "White Ribbon Hymnal," the "Y Song Book," and "Marching Songs," we have a wide range of selections, adapted to temperance workers of all ages from the mother in Israel to the tiniest tot in the Loyal Temperance Legion. Excellent adaptations have been made from the best masters, Mozart, Handel, Mendelssohn and others, while more modern compositions are not only tuneful in melody, but dignified in sentiment. The Hymnal should be our standard singing book and every one of our ten thousand unions should be amply supplied with it, thus "speaking one to another in psalms, hymns and spiritual songs."

"Oh, come, let us sing unto the Lord," while we are here engaged in His work, and when it is complete, and we are called up higher,

"Oh, may we join the choir invisible!"

COLUMBIAN CRUMBS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

THE MODEL SUNDAY-SCHOOL BUILDING.

Last summer the Sixth International Sunday-school convention offered prizes of $500, $250, $150 and $100 for the four best designs for a model Sunday-school building, to be erected in connection with the World's Fair. For two days the offices of B. F. Jacobs, chairman of the International Executive Committee, have been thronged with leading workers in the "nursery of the church." Prominent among them was William Reynolds, of Peoria, whose wife is one of the strong towers of the W. C. T. U., as well as of the church. Mr. Reynolds was a member of the jury having the difficult task of selecting the best to the fourth in merit from thirty-eight designs of great excellence. The first prize goes to Hoffman & Upham, of this city, and the other three are awarded to architects of Akron, Ohio, Denver, Colorado, and Toledo, Ohio. Under the stimulus of the prizes the architecture of Sunday-school buildings has received valuable contributions.

MORE ABOUT THE WOMAN'S CONGRESS.

In order to a perfect understanding of the nature and purpose of the Woman's Congress, and its relation to other congresses, Mesdames Palmer and Henrotin issue a circular letter showing that it is not intended to supersede the proper work of women in any other line of the World's Congress work. Women will have their own place to fill in the great gatherings for temperance, education, science, music, moral and social reform, and other departments of progress. This congress of representative women will show the status of women in all lands, and in all phases of human progress more fully than there could be opportunity to do in the respective departments of the World's Congress. "Here," the circular states, "all organizations of women of whatever name or object, and all distinguished women, whether they belong to any particular organization or not, will meet on absolutely equal terms for the advancement of the common interests of women everywhere." The idea of an Ecumenical Council of women this year, instead of their usual annual gatherings, found favor with many organizations, notably the National and International Councils of Women and the Federation of Women's Clubs, and their united and untiring zeal guarantees the success of the congress.

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT.

We shall all want to peer into the eight cases containing the exhibit of the American Bible Society. There we shall see a copy of the original King James edition, published in 1611; also a fac simile of the first chapter of the first Bible ever printed, the famous Mazarin of 1450. A copy of the Biblia Pauperum will show the style of printing from wooden blocks, before the invention of movable types. The Good Book will be there in nearly three hundred dialects, of some of which we never before heard, as the Sheetsiva, Mpongwe, Azerbijan and other tongues unpronounceable. A handsome pamphlet will explain the exhibit, and contain specimen verses in two hundred and forty-two foreign languages. Some rare curios are shown, which have been taken in barter for the Scriptures in far-off lands. One of these is a copper coin, minted in China, A. D. 25, which was given one of the society's agents for a copy of the gospels. We shall see a photograph of a Roman manuscript of the Pentateuch that is nine hundred years old. It is the property of a Hebrew synagogue in China, where it is supposed to have been in use for centuries. Best of all, the society is preparing for free distribution of the five-cent edition of the New Testament. A quarter of a million have already been published for that purpose.

"THE WHEEL OF PLEASURE."

Art and architecture must share space and honors with industry and science, even with frolic, as a mammoth merry-go-round is now being planted. This fairy wheel promises to rival the Eiffel tower in novelty and proportions, but it will hardly do so in beauty. It is a sort of cross between the bicycle and the old-fashioned English breast-water wheel, imagining the latter to grow to a diameter of two hundred and fifty feet, and to have each of its boxes occupied with a car capable of seating sixty passengers. This wheel revolves between two towers, the power being furnished by two link-motion, reversible engines of 2,000 horse power. The cars, thirty-six in number, and larger than ordinary railway coaches, are suspended by great steel trunion pins. It takes twenty minutes to make the—literally "round"—trip, up one side and down the other. At the summit the passenger finds himself in a sightly place, two hundred and sixty feet from the ground, with the whole Fair and most of the city in view, beside a goodly portion of Lake Michigan. The entire structure is of steel, the great axle, thirty-three inches in diameter and forty-five feet long, being the largest piece of steel ever forged. The venture is made by a firm of Pittsburg bridge builders, who are very confident of its success. Every precaution is taken to insure safety. The foundations are laid thirty-five feet below the surface, and the engine is duplicated, so if one becomes disabled the other can land the passengers.

THE ARK OF FREEDOM.

Every American heart will quicken its pace as its possessor stands by the steel-clad, fire-proof box in the State Department of the Government Building, which holds the original drafts of the Constitution of the United States, the Declaration of Independence, and the Articles of Confederation. The latter are in perfect preservation. The exquisite engrossing looks as if it might be just completed, and the long roll of fine sheepskin parchment is without blemish. The Declaration of Independence shows the touch of time. Most of the signatures have disappeared under the slow bleach of age, and the text is illegible in many lines. But its principles are written indelibly in the civilization and development which makes Columbia herself the greatest marvel of the Columbian Exposition.

WHAT WILL IT COST?

The most comforting thought that came to the administration in which so much clear thinking has been done, was the one which organized the great rooming scheme managed by the Bureau of Public Comfort, in charge of Major Kassan, whose experience at the Centennial was a kindergarten education for his present office. It has arrested and is sure to defeat the attempt to charge extortionate prices for rooms. Major Kassan announces that if 25,000 persons should apply for lodgings at once he could send them to places which the bureau has investigated and will vouch for, at prices ranging from $1 to $2.50 a day. Of course these figures do not include board. Visitors desiring boarding places will be accommodated, but it will be cheaper and more convenient to get meals wherever the sight-seer chances to be at meal time. As a matter of fact a good deal of anxiety is felt among parties who have invested in hotel and lodging-house enterprises lest they lose money instead of "making a fortune." The Palmer House has set the key for down-town hotels by posting notices that it will not advance rates. The prospect is that the scramble will be for guests rather than for rooms.

THE NEWS IN GREAT GOTHAM.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A meeting of the Christian League of Social Purity was recently held at the home of Mrs. E. B. Grannis, the president. Rev. A. H. Lewis, of Plainfield, N. Y. (one of the active protestants against the recent race-track bill, of New Jersey), spoke with great earnestness of the injustice of a double standard of morals for men and women, and he urged all women to use their influence, both by pen and tongue, to help create a public opinion, which shall hold licentious men equally in disgrace with women of the same character.

Mrs. M. Louise Thomas gave a graphic sketch of the degraded social condition of the peasant women in Russia, stating facts which had come to her knowledge through her personal observation. "The girls," she said, "marry at the age of twelve; the boys must go into the army at eighteen, and must be married before they go. The poor peasants live in huts, with clay floors, and no chimneys, sometimes fourteen persons occupying a room which would not hold four comfortably. "Oh," she exclaimed, "the life of these women is something dreadful."

Miss Anna Dickinson having been discovered in a quiet corner of the room was loudly called for. At first she declined, but her intense sympathy with the subject under discussion prevailed, and she took the floor amid great applause. She was most becomingly dressed, and looked very bright and handsome as she told, with her magnetic voice and her old-time courage and eloquence, the story of how she helped to defeat, years ago in St. Louis, the infamous bill to license prostitution. In speaking of her belief that many fallen women realized so keenly their hopeless condition that they would do all in their power to save others from it, she said that at one time, many years ago, to gratify her desire to see for herself the depths to which women could fall, and that she might the more intelligently help them, she one evening joined a slumming party who went without making themselves conspicuous, simply to observe. In one of these haunts of vice a woman came to her, and with eyes full of tears, thrust a dollar bill into her hand, saying, "Here, dear, that is all I have, but take it, do, and go away from here as far as you can, it is no place for you." After that incident, the voice of Anna Dickinson was louder and clearer than ever when pleading for justice and protection for women.

Mrs. E. B. Grannis, that "brave little woman," as Miss Willard calls her, gave a large evening reception at her house, on March 14, in honor of Mrs. May Wright Sewell, president of the National Council of Women, for the purpose of affording an opportunity to interest New Yorkers in the affairs of the Congress of Representative women at the World's Fair. A meeting was also arranged for March 16, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, with the object of securing contributions, as this body has agreed to be responsible for the entertainment of all the women delegates to the Congress from foreign lands, and this means a large expenditure and the money to meet it.

Kate Field is said to "pooh-pooh" the "No Crinoline League," and advises women "not to be scared until they are hurt." It is the time now to be on guard. That mysterious force which makes our fashions, and for purposes of its own would compel us to wear what we do not like, is wary enough to distract our attention from the real evil by threatening us with "hoop skirts." The additional fullness now required in dress skirts does not alarm, but it means more material, stiffer and heavier linings, all of which will add very much to the weight women must carry around. It means more petticoats to keep the fullness from interfering with locomotion, and then will come the ungraceful hoop skirt to help carry the burden. Women, not strong, who have found such relief and comfort in wearing the light and sensible clothing for so many years will not willingly go back to the slavery of heavy skirts. In 1849 it was not uncommon for ladies to wear eight and ten stiffly starched petticoats, and it took them a long time to recover from the effects of that fashion. Now it threatens us again! Shall we tamely submit to this diabolical attempt upon our health and happiness?

"Doctor," said a gay young girl to a lady physician, the other day, "what do you think of the new fashion?" "Good for the doctors," was the laconic reply; "I have great confidence in the native good sense of women, and do not believe that they will adopt a fashion so harmful."

Sorosis has just elected its officers for the ensuing year. It is always an interesting day, as it brings to the surface hitherto undiscovered phases of character and new experiences to the observer of human nature. On the morning of election day there is the annual address of the president, and the annual reports of the officers, closing with the report of the nominating committee. After luncheon (during which there is a good deal of electioneering for favorite candidates) the balloting begins. Mrs. Jennie de la Loyier was reëlected president without a dissenting voice. Her popularity is based upon her agreeable manners, her ability to preside intelligently and with gentle justice and good judgment. She is an able writer and a pleasing speaker, and we shall be proud to be represented by her in the Woman's Congress at the coming Exposition.

Many of the older members of Sorosis have long advocated the building of a club house. That object has not yet been attained, but an extract from the president's address will show that Sorosis appreciates and rejoices over the success of other clubs, who are so fortunate as to own their own home.

"The women of Wilmington, Del., chose the finest site in town, and selected a young and beautiful woman as the architect. The building she has erected for woman's work is a symphony of delicate, restful, inspiring color. Soft, jonquil yellow, cream, old-rose and sea-green enchant the eye, while genial curves and colonial festoons gratify equally well the sense of form. We enjoy the prosperity of our children, but we also recognize that to us as a club has been committed the matrix in which these womanly forces crystallized sufficiently to house themselves in splendor, and manifest to the world their coherent strength."

The West End Presbyterian church at 105th street and Columbus avenue is alive and very wide awake in all its departments. Rev. John Balcom Shaw, the pastor, is very popular among his people and is a hard worker. Since its organization, five years ago, the membership of the church has increased from sixty-nine to eight hundred, and the Sunday-school, connected with the church, has nine hundred pupils. It is one of the comparatively few churches in the city using unfermented wine at the communion service. For this, praise the Lord! I have often wondered what will be the feelings of Christian ministers in the other world when brought face to face with the wretchedness of those who have become intemperate through wine at the Lord's table.

On my return from the refreshment room, at an elegant reception not long ago, I was met by the hostess, who said: "Did you notice that no wine was served?" "I did, indeed," I replied, "and I am delighted that you are using your influence upon the right side." And so, little by little the leaven works.

A FLYING TRIP FOR SOCIAL PURITY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It was ten o'clock on a November Saturday night when I drove up to the door of the Revell Cottage, which is a part of the Northfield (Massachusetts) School for Girls. The road was filled with a crowd of girl students, Chinese lanterns illuminated the Cottage and grounds, and I might have imagined that I was receiving an ovation had I not known that Mr. Moody was coming home, after an absence of fourteen months.

Twenty minutes after my arrival his carriage drove up, and the girlish voices broke into the school cheer:

"Hail, Northfield, hail the blue,
Hail, all hail, Northfield!"

This was twice repeated, then followed by a song of welcome to their benefactor. As it died into silence Mr. Moody's voice was heard from the carriage, saying in quiet tones:

"Thank you, girls, for your hearty welcome. When I left home fourteen months ago you sang, 'The Lord bless thee and keep thee.' I should like to hear it again."

The request was granted, and the song was given in voices whose tones bespoke the deep feeling stirred by remembrances. Then again Mr. Moody said gently: "Good-night, girls," and drove on to his home, and the girls quietly dispersed.

The next morning the village church was filled with students and friends of Mr. Moody, all hoping to hear from him an account of his escape from the perils of the deep, and they were not disappointed. The audience in this church is a peculiar one, from the fact that it is largely made up of young men and young women, the students of the two schools under Mr. Moody's care.

The week spent at Northfield in talking to the three hundred school girls concerning themselves, their needs, and their value, was a very satisfactory one. There is nothing pleasanter than to address an audience of bright, alert, responsive girls. They are so eager to learn, so receptive of truth, so appreciative, both of humor and seriousness, that they are a constant source of inspiration. One address was given here to the training-school of sixty young women, who are studying the Bible.

As a marked contrast to these self-reliant girls, who have noble aims and ambitions, may be mentioned the girls in the Florence Rescue Home in New York City, and yet, I think these girls were as interested a class of listeners as any I have ever had. As one of them said to Mrs. Prindle, the matron, who mothers them all so tenderly: "We never had a chance to learn about ourselves before, and we'd have been better girls if we had been taught all about ourselves."

This is, to me, the key-note of the social purity work the teaching of both boys and girls the truths of purity before they fall into sin. For this reason the addresses given to the Working Girls' clubs in New York City were to me of great interest. I had spoken before to several of the clubs and was greeted as if I were an old friend. These girls were as interested and responsive as the girls in Moody's school, but in a different way. They were not so much learning new things, but learning to think of things in a new light. One of them wrote to Miss Dodge, thanking her for her great interest in the girls, and said:

"We girls have often talked among ourselves about these things and wondered about them, but since we heard Dr. Allen's lecture it all seems so different, we feel that we have been helped." Such words of appreciation are an invaluable compensation.

Another important opportunity of presenting truth was given in the invitation to address the young women being trained as teachers at No. 9 University Place, New York. Here the theme was the need of teachers being educated to solve all the moral problems that they will meet in the school-room, and for which many teachers are so unprepared.

In Washington, D. C., the opportunities for educational work presented themselves in an address to an audience of a thousand or more young people of the Christian Endeavor Society, and in addresses to both the white and colored Y. M. C. A. on purity of manhood.

In Richmond, Virginia, besides the lectures to women, and public addresses in the churches, I spoke to the colored people in several gatherings, among the most notable the Theological Seminary for colored men and the Hartshorne Memorial School for colored girls. At the first mentioned, with the aid of our assistant superintendent and Mrs. Pleasants, the local president, I organized a White Cross society with fifty-six members. At the latter a White Shield society was started, which now numbers about eighty-five members.

I should not forget to state that in Lititz, Pennsylvania, a White Shield society was organized with forty-nine members, and left under the fostering care of Miss Kemper and Miss Weitzel. I here met our W. C. T. U. worker in physical culture, Miss Lydia Newcomb, who was arousing much enthusiasm among the girls of Linden Hall Seminary, in regard to healthful dress and physical development.

From Richmond we next went to Norfolk, Va., where we spent several pleasant days. We visited there the colored mission school with several hundred pupils, and have reason to believe that the purity work will be continued by the teachers who were greatly interested. We also had opportunity to see what the benevolence of Mrs. Heminway, of Boston, is doing for white girls and boys in a fine school equipped and maintained by her, and managed most capably by Miss Corinne Harrison, who gives especial attention to physical development by the Ling (Swedish) system of gymnastics, being convinced that health, intellect and morals are all promoted by proper culture of the body. Addresses were made at the Boys' Academy and the college for girls.

The Virginia state Y. M. C. A. was holding its convention at Norfolk in this time, and on Sunday I addressed its woman's meeting on "The Marys and Marthas of the Nineteenth Century," and also the meeting of its men delegates on the subject of purity.

Everywhere we met with a cordial reception, especially from teachers who are beginning to realize most fully that ignorance and innocence are not synonymous, but that true knowledge is the foundation of virtue. Mothers, too, are eagerly asking how they may become the wise counselors and instructors of their children; and I am more and more impressed that this phase of our department work is the broadest and most far-reaching.

THE SUFFRAGE BADGE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Kindly state to the friends of woman suffrage, through the columns of your paper, that immediately upon the publication of the minutes of our last convention, the status of the suffrage badge (which was adopted at the twenty-fourth annual convention of the N. A. W. S. A.) will be established. As chairman of the committee on badge, appointed at that convention, I have been notified of action taken by individuals and societies relative to the purchase and wearing of our badge.

The object of this letter is to place the matter clearly before the suffragists of our country. These badges will be helpful at all conferences and reunions of the organizations devoted to work for woman suffrage, and their value will be recognized especially at Chicago during the Columbian Exposition. No mere ribbon of a color worn by many colleges and other societies would carry the distinct meaning of a particular badge. Application will be made to the proper authorities to enable the individuals who will manufacture these badges to place them on sale at the Columbian Exposition.

An erroneous idea prevails in regard to this badge; which should be corrected here. The committee on badge was abolished at the last convention, but the badge itself was placed in the hands of private parties for manufacture, in order that no tax might be placed upon the treasury of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association. This action did not affect the position of the badge; it had been adopted at the convention of 1892 as the badge of the suffrage associations, and is the recognized badge, therefore, of the suffragists of America.

Communications received by me in regard to the badge will be forwarded to those having the actual work in charge, and as soon as prices are settled upon and the work begun, the address of the persons manufacturing the badge, with other information, will be sent to all the suffrage papers.

A WELCOME HOME.

BY MRS. M. O. PAGE.

There is no life too sweet to live,
No day nor hour too rich to give
To winning back from paths of sin
The hearts that sadly tread therein.

Who would not run on willing feet,
Along a hot and dusty street,
To point to some dear soul instead
A cooling path in which to tread?

Who would not place on some far height
The burning splendor of a light,
That shining on—on land and sea—
A welcome home its gleams may be.

SOPHIA'S NERVE.

BY MABEL GIFFORD.

Mr. Josiah Canting was big, broad-shouldered, and a hearty, good-natured man, a prosperous business man, as any one could tell with half a look at him. Mrs. Josiah Canting was a timid little woman with an anxious face.

It was often remarked that Mrs. Josiah Canting had "one of the best husbands in the world, and everything to live for," and yet—and yet—

There was a shadow that marred the Canting sunshine. It was a very timid shadow, and as persistent as timid. It never for a moment left Mrs. Canting's side; it was always at Mr. Canting's elbow, whenever he spoke of his wife, and whenever they appeared together in public, the shadow never failed to accompany them. The shadow was to blame for the wrinkles in Mrs. Canting's forehead. The shadow was to blame for the deprecatory manner that was habitual with this lady, especially when in Mr. Canting's presence. The shadow was to blame for Mr. Canting's apologetic air whenever he mentioned "Sophia, my wife." From his superior height he seemed perpetually to be looking down upon her and saying: "What a pity!"

This imposing gentleman admired "nerve"; he admired the fortunate people who possessed "nerve"; he especially admired women of "nerve." Mrs. Josiah Canting tried very hard to have it, but the more she thought about it and the harder she tried, the more she seemed not to have it. She was very sorry about it, for Josiah's sake, and she wished for her own sake that he might be able to admire her as much as he did some other women.

"What Sophia lacks is nerve," Mr. Canting had been heard to remark on various occasions. "Nerve is what Sophia wants."

But she did not get it, though Josiah took her in hand and gave her a thorough course of society, and followed that up by a year of travel. In the first course she never got beyond devoutly praying that her husband's shoulders might be broad enough to hide her from society's gaze; and for the last, the shadow grew so fast and Sophia grew so thin that Mr. Canting gave up the quest, returned to his home and settled down to make the best of it.

Truth to tell Mrs. Josiah Canting was an uncommonly timid woman. She was afraid of so many things that she was constantly afraid of something. She was always afraid of the weather, and for Josiah's health. In society she was in perpetual fear of saying or doing, or of not saying or not doing, that which would mortify Mr. Canting. Travel, for Sophia, was but a series of fears from beginning to end. On the cars she was afraid the switches would not be turned, that bridges would break, that the engineer was intemperate, that cows and babies were on the track. If she traveled by coach she feared the coach would fall over, that the horses had too heavy a load, that the driver was not reliable, that the passengers were pickpockets, that robbers were in ambush along the highway. On the boat, she feared the smell of cigars and bananas would make her sick, that the sea-breeze would give her neuralgia, that the children would fall overboard. At night the fog-horn was her greatest terror, there was sure to be a collision. She was always prepared to hear the cry of fire; every night she had a presentiment of a fearful storm and a shipwreck.

What wonder this little woman's husband became disheartened! If all this practical training failed to develop "nerve," "nerve" must be an unknown quantity in Mrs. Josiah Canting's constitution. So he settled down to live at home with his nerveless wife and the shadow. But his lot was not as trying as it might have been, for Martha, the housemaid, robust and rosy, hearty and happy, never was known to have a fear, and Harriet, Josiah's brother Sol's wife, often made them a visit, and nothing on earth had been discovered that she was afraid of. It was strange that with these three examples of "nerve" about her, Sophia grew more shrinking and hesitating and seemed to lose what little spirit she had.

There was a severe tempest one night when brother Sol's wife was visiting at Josiah's. He takes great delight in telling about that night. He has told the story times without number, and without a doubt will keep on telling it times without number. On this memorable night he was awakened by what he defined as a "tremendous racket." There was wind and rain and thunder, and a faint little voice whispering, "Josiah! oh, Josiah!"

Now all the tumult of the elements without did not disturb Mr. Josiah Canting as did that faint little voice: "Josiah! oh, Josiah! if you only would light a lamp."

The lightning blazed into the room and seemed to set it on fire, and Sophia was terribly afraid of lightning. Of course he started for a lamp. He groped his way to the parlor and an opportune flash aided him to the mantel; half way to the table where the lamp was, he struck something and almost instantaneously something struck him.

"Sophia!" he did not whisper; "Sophia! Sophia! Oh, ugh! I've broken my leg. Send for a doctor, quick."

There was an exclamation and a soft rustling sound. Sophia was coming. He had rather feared she would not dare.

"Sophia, where are you?"

"I'm trying to find the lamp."

"Don't stop for lamps; go for Harriet, quick. I'm in agony, Sophia. I can't stir until the doctor comes."

The pandemonium without and the terrible accident within completely unnerved the timid little woman. She crept up the stairs, pulling herself up a step at a time by the railing. There was a light in Harriet's room but no Harriet could be found. Calling her name brought no answer. On she want to Martha's room. Martha was standing on a chair in the center of the room, wringing her hands and wailing.

Finding it impossible to get the crazed girl's attention, and her presence seeming only to increase her frenzy, Mrs. Canting made her way back to her own room and heard Josiah groaning. The tempest increased and it seemed as if the whole heavens were crashing down. Sophia threw herself on the bed and tried to shut out lighi and sound; then she arose and tried to find her clothing.

Mr. Josiah Canting was in torment; and added to the pain in his leg was the conviction that every one in the house had deserted him. He felt so ill-treated and grew so angry thinking about it that he vowed he would find those heartless women and give them a piece of his mind. He quite forgot that he could not move, and jerked himself about and pulled himself over the floor until he came to a door. He got the door open and found himself in the hall. A light from an open door above shone out. He called loudly for Harriet, but only the tempest answered.

More slowly and painfully than Sophia had climbed the stairs half an hour before, Josiah climbed them now. No Harriet in Harriet's room, no Martha in Martha's room, no Sophia anywhere.

"I have it!" cried Josiah at last, "the three of them have gone for the doctor."

While waiting for arrivals Mr. Canting amused himself by getting into his clothes. It was an exquisitely painful amusement and it lasted a long time, but still there were no arrivals. He waited an eternity and then he hobbled into the hall and opened the outer door which he found unlocked. He had thought the tempest about over but another cloud seemed to be coming up and coming fast.

While the impatient man peered into the inky blackness without, there came a vivid flash and a tremendous crash, followed by a splintering sound and the swift sweep of branches falling.

"The elm!" exclaimed the man at the door, and forgetting his hurt, he rushed toward the tree. In that instant's flash he had seen something under the elm. A little black shadow it looked to be, and wonderfully familiar.

"Sophia! Sophia! are you there? Are you dead?" shouted the man, as if the dead were in the habit of announcing their exit.

A calm voice behind him inquired: "Josiah, where are you going?"

"Sophia! Soo—phia!" The little woman was seized and carried into the house in a twinkling.

"Where are the others?" said Mr. Canting, as soon as he got his breath, depositing his burden on the sofa.

"I don't know."

"When did you miss them?"

"I did not find them, or one I could not find, and the other I could not make hear."

"And you—"

"I went for the doctor; he's out of town."

"Sophia, do you tell me that you went alone?"

"I had to; there was no one else."

"Soo—phia!"

That was all he said, but he never had said so much to his wife before.

After the tempest was over they found Martha in the cellar and Harriet under the eaves. The latter crawled from her hiding-place looking, as Josiah afterward expressed it, "sheepish."

"Why!" she cried to divert attention from herself. "I thought you were ill."

"You thought—" said Mr. Canting looking at her queerly.

Then Harriet confessed that she had been so frightened that she ran down stairs to be near some one, and had heard Josiah groaning and begging Sophia to send for the doctor.

"I knew you would come for me," she said, "and I ran back and hid. I wouldn't have gone out in that tempest for the President himself," she declared.

"Sophia is timid, ordinarily," Josiah Canting frequently remarks when speaking of his wife, "but when it comes to anything serious, she has more nerve than any other woman I know."

The little shadow had vanished from the Canting sunshine. Sophia declares that it perished on the night of the memorable tempest, and Josiah is of the same mind, for he saw it under the elm when it fell.

HOW TO LIVE WELL.

Time is a purely relative conception. It has no independent existence. It is nothing but a mode of thought. Our weakness somehow shapes the shadow of time. It is an error altogether to regard time as anything save a condition of existence, and it is folly to try to define eternity either as limited or unlimited, as having either a beginning or an end. Eternity is existence without bound or duration; present, without past or future; to-day, without yesterday or to-morrow. Better still would it be, perhaps, to say: Eternity is inconceivable as succession, only conceivable as a state; or, in other words, eternity is not the extension of time, but the exclusion of time. It does not mean that time shall be forever, but in the words of that great angel in the Apocalypse, who stood with one foot on sea and one on land, and uplifted his hand to heaven with a mighty oath that "Time shall be no more!"

Eternity has nothing to do with time. And we should not be misled by the fact that through all our theology and teaching is woven the error that it has. The slang of newspapers describes a man who is hanged as having been "launched into eternity." The preacher says of one who has just died that he has "passed into eternity." All such language, however common, is quite erroneous. Eternity is not the future, it is now. Death will bring us into contact with many unseen things, but not with eternity, for we are in touch with it now, and woe unto us if we do not live in the sense of that truth. Eternity is the only real element of our present existence, and in it alone we truly live and move and have our being. There is nothing in the Scriptures to lead us into these nonsensical attempts to add up the items of the immeasurable. St. John when speaking of eternal life, never once gives sanction to these unthinkable fantasies. He does not so much as hint that eternal life is akin with time, present or future. He says: "This is life eternal"—not this shall be—not that they should live endless billions of ages, but "that they should know Thee, the only God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." And our blessed Lord and Master said: "He that believeth on me hath eternal life." Any other reading encourages the fatal error that we are living amongst passing things only, and that not till we reach the hereafter shall we be amongst permanent things. If it were so, life would be futile. But we are among the things unseen yet permanent; and we ought, if we are Christians, to go to heaven and be in heaven every day; as the Bishop of Derry once said, "The path to heaven should lie through heaven, and all the way to heaven be heaven." The unseen does not mean the unreal; the invisible world is about us no less than the visible, and if the senses do not realize it the heart confesses it.

To know God; that is life eternal. We do wrong to brood over memories of the vanished past, or yearnings over the unborn future, or struggles for the fleeting present. "Not in what has been, is, or is to be, the wise soul lives; but in the wider time which is not any, but contains the three." Because God is eternal, all things which partake of Him are eternal also. Man's evilness and pettiness shall be as scum in the burning, but all that is divine in his nature—all love, faith, tenderness, true service—shall be redeemed forever.

Summarizing briefly my points, I would say:

First—The object of all revelation is to teach us that in the midst of time we are children of eternity.

Next—Learn the lesson of the presence of eternity in time; of the fact that eternity is time and time eternity. Live for the things unseen, and yet which are our life.

Lastly—The secret of the saintly life is not in any sense to live in and for the future, but to live in and for the eternal. And that the eternal life is not the future. It is!

No man can always be thinking of the future. We have work to do now. True, it is often wearisome and discouraging, thankless and distasteful; but if we turn from it simply to brood on heaven, we commit the old error of mediæval monks and ascetics. Our duty is to toil through our tasks, to bear our burdens with a continuous aggressive energy springing out of fellowship with God, and leading to fellowship yet deeper with Him; thus saving ourselves from the servitude of outward circumstances and the curse of chance desires, and leading us to sympathy with toiling, troubled, wicked men, because they are brethren in God.—Archdeacon Farrar.

WORDS TO THE WISE.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

What it came to my mind to do was to count up all the alikenesses of people, the born alikenesses or whatever comes by nature to all of us. I know what set me thinking of this. It was working among people living in so many different ways; some wealthy and having learning and genteel manners and mansions and costly array, and others in poor circumstances with little or no learning and hard pushed to always get enough to eat and wear.

To-day I have been doing some work on a camel's hair wrapper, every grain wool, for a lady with no end of money—Miss Finissy, I call her, because she is so particular and precise—and she sat by, working her embroidery, and all of a sudden she pricked her finger and squealed out, "Ew! ew!" Now, the woman that washes for the woman that I hire my room of pricked her finger this morning with a pin, left in the belt of an apron that was in the suds, and she said "Ew! ew!" in the same way, and I put the two things together and they set me to thinking, and when I start off a-thinking it seems as if there was no end to it, and my thoughts kept running on and on.

She has mints of money—I thought—and wears diamond rings and velvet gowns and speaks her words in a fashionable tone of voice, and uses genteel manners, but she feels the prick and starts and squeals, all just the same as the washerwoman. From this I went on to all the various aches and ailments and I perceived that the pain of none of these is helped or hindered by the things that seem to separate people.

All manner of persons like to be comfortably warm and comfortably cool and comfortably fed and clothed—and are loth to die. Fire burns and frost freezes and diseases slay and accidents happen without respect to persons, and "Time cuts down all," both the worldly great and the worldly small. And when death comes can anything then make any difference to the bodies whether the coffins are of mahogany or pine? Arrayed like princes or like paupers dust goes to dust. And the people bereft, not only do they cry with the very same kind of tears, but their hearts ache with the same anguish.

And then memory recalled two scenes I had witnessed. They came up before me as plain as pictures. One was at the washerwoman's—a bare-looking room. Her daughter's little three-year-old boy had just died. The mother throws herself across the foot of the bed and moans softly, oh, such a pitiful moan! The father comes in from his work, a dull looking man, hands and face all grimy from the machine shop. He goes to the bed, glances at the body, sinks down by it, kneeling, buries his face in the bedclothes and groans. The grandmother tries to pacify him. He whispers to her, "Mother, the light of the house has gone."

The other scene was in, oh, such a beautiful apartment! But death knew no difference. There were soft carpets and gilt-edged looking-glasses, and costly furniture and servants to fetch and carry, and expensive nurses and doctors, and all that money could obtain, but the reality was just as real. I remember the mother, how piteously she moaned, and the father, he cried and sobbed like a baby, and he said to me: "Aunt Phosie"—he always calls me "Aunt Phosie,"—he said to me those very same words: "The light of the house has gone."

Some people say that thinking of one kind of thing makes you think of its opposite, and that is the way it is with me. These two sad scenes bring to recollection two happy ones. But I perceive that I have come to another part of the subject. I began with our mere bodily substances and bodily feelings, and perceived these to be naturally about the same in all. But joy and grief are apart from what is felt by the flesh. I will have to keep on, though, all the same. It is always so when a thought takes hold of me. I must let it go its whole length, or else have no peace. I began by noticing that the colonel's wife spoke to a moneyed woman in a tone of voice not like the one she used in speaking to a poor woman; and that set me to questioning what were the real, natural-born differences between the people that are in different stations of society in our town, and I mean to keep on thinking till I either find some or find I cannot find any.

HOW TO SECURE A PAYING AUDIENCE.

BY F. B. ANDERSON.

1. Build up a reputation; never have anything but an entertainment; do not engage speakers just to fill up the time.

2. Let temperance entertainments be free; the time has not come when the general public will pay to hear a temperance lecture.

3. If your speaker is not very well known have a specialty in the line of music—even if you have to pay for it.

4. Issue tickets of admission, as for a private entertainment.

5. Have twice as many tickets as the seating capacity of your hall; it is all the better if some persons must be turned away; they will be determined to get in the next time.

6. Let members distribute most of the tickets, exacting from each person a promise to use the ticket or hand it to some one who will. Also appoint a certain place where tickets can be called for.

7. Have as many stirring locals in your papers as possible. Let them appear every other day for ten days before the lecture. Always present the press with tickets, asking for a reporter for the lecture, and see that a table to write upon is ready near or on the platform.

8. Keep on the right side of the press; if anything is reported wrong, do not notice it, but sweetly smile and bow the first time you meet the editor.

9. Send notices to the pulpits, and ask ministers to sit on the platform.

10. Write little notes of invitation to sympathizers and other prominent men, asking them to honor you with their presence upon the platform; a little well-put attention goes a long way with our brothers.

11. Take up a collection at conclusion of address. If possible, get the speaker to ask for it at the close of his remarks. Colonel Bain does this in model style, quietly remarking that a collection is going to be taken, and "if there is any real mean, stingy person present, now is the time for him to go out." Announce that your best music is to come after the collection.

12. Pay for hall, advertising, music, speaker, etc., and put the balance in your treasury. There will be a balance, sure.

Trenton, N. J.

"WORK is development; work is culture. It is the appointed means to the higher end. It is a dignity and not a degradation. It is something to be joyfully and triumphantly accepted, and not deprecated or despised. If the keen spur of necessity impels the individual out into new fields to conquer, then blessed be that necessity. Of course, if the impelling power be inward grace rather than outward necessity; if it be genius that seeks expression rather than capacity that seeks to earn a living, so much the higher; the ideal conditions are where genius and spiritual power are so strong that no surroundings of ease or luxury could stifle them. The great leaders and teachers of the world are independent of poverty or riches. Their expression is not compelled by the one or stifled by the other. Genius, when allied to spiritual energy, is the true aristocracy, and is so far above any mere human conditions as to be unfettered and uninfluenced by them. A woman discovers some latent talent or taste, and then proceeds to develop it; sometimes with success, sometimes without it, but at all events the struggle leaves her somewhat the more invigorated, somewhat the larger for the effort, somewhat nearer the vision than in her previously becalmed existence. Heaven itself can offer nothing to the souls pauperized by inaction, for heaven is a spiritual condition, and can only be enjoyed when the soul is in harmony with the Divine conditions."

"ONE great gain in reading papers that are carried on in the interest of religion and philanthropy, is that our minds are filled with the good news of how Christ's kingdom is spreading in the earth, by the self-denying labors of His faithful followers, and not the world's works of folly and crime, of selfish overreaching for gain and power. We have thus, for our thought-companions, the noble and great of soul, the pure and spiritual, and learn to look upon sin and degradation as linked with the purpose of deliverance. This gives the inspiration of the soldier going hopefully to battle, instead of the discouragement of one surrounded by an army of enemies. Visions of harvest and fruitage make joyous our seed-sowing, for while we know that some will fall on wayside or shallow soil, some will bring forth a hundred fold, for do we not read of such reapings, every week, somewhere in the Lord's world-wide vineyard?"

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

But wilt thou know, oh, vain man, that faith without works is dead? Was not Abraham, our father, justified by works when he had offered Isaac, his son, upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? —James 2:20, 21, 22.

For the first time in five years I have been forced to place the Temple Item column in charge of another. Mrs. Harriet B. Kells, one of the editorial staff of THE UNION SIGNAL, has for the last six weeks, with loving devotion as well as great ability, taken charge of this column for me. I am glad to be able again to take up the work, and through the Temple column once more exchange greetings with my beloved white-ribbon sisters, the dear children, and all others who are interested in building the Temple, or rather in paying for it, and in making it our very own. Satan would snatch it from our grasp if he could, as the terrible onslaught that has been made upon it of late has plainly shown. Let us not be fearful, but believing. "Our God shall fight for us." There cannot be anything better said than the following words contained in the resolution passed in behalf of the Temple at the last National Convention: "There is but one just and reasonable course to pursue. That we stand with solid front and united effort until we reach the successful and triumphant completion of this great enterprise." Cannot all help, both young and old? Counting the children, we number about five hundred thousand strong. If this great army could send one dollar each, we would have half a million dollars in a short time. Our little friend, Nettie King, of Oak Park, Ill., a dear girl, nine years old, who is now filling her mite-box for the third time, called with her mother at our office in the Temple the other day. She said to the secretary: "Tell Mrs. Carse I am going to work harder than ever to get my mite-box filled quick, to help pay for the Temple." If all children and adults would make a like decision the scoffers who say the Temple will not be paid for in twenty years would soon be put to shame.

A COLUMBIAN SOUVENIR OF THE TEMPLE.

For months past the Scovill Manufacturing Company, metal manufacturers, have been at work executing a large and beautiful medal of the Temple. The metal in which it is cast is the new and wonderful aluminum, which takes on such a lovely finish, even finer than silver; it far surpasses that metal for the above purpose as it does not tarnish and is lighter. On one side of the medal stands out clear and beautiful the stately Temple in all its noble proportions; around the margin are the words: "National Building of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Temple, Chicago." Underneath in smaller lettering: "Corner-stone laid November 1, 1890. Height, 262 feet. Cost $1,200,000." On the reverse side are medallion heads of Miss Frances E. Willard and the founder of the Temple; around the margin their names and office; underneath the legend, "For God and Home and Every Land." It is considered by connoisseurs the most beautiful medal ever cast in aluminum. Its finish is exquisite; it has the soft silvery sheen of satin. It is gotten up as a Columbian souvenir and will be for sale during the World's Columbian Exposition not only in our own Temple but at the W. C. T. U. booth in the Woman's Building on the Fair grounds. The price of the medal enclosed in a handsome box is fifty cents. All persons who cannot visit the Fair can have one of these lovely medals of our "House Beautiful" by enclosing to our financial secretary, Miss Sara Johnson, the above sum, which includes postage. We have a new offer to make our friends holding mite-boxes, or who desire to send me a two-cent stamp to secure one. From May 1st, 1893, until May 1st, 1894, all persons who collect in their mite-boxes $2.50 will receive one of the above beautiful medals of the Temple. It seems as though the poorest in our ranks might with the help of others raise this amount and secure the medal which should be owned by every white-ribboner as a most cherished souvenir.

I want to thank my friends for the beautiful letters of sympathy and confidence I have received from them during the last few weeks of sore trial. The letters have been so numerous it is impossible for me to return personal answers. I therefore take this method to reply. I cannot express in words my deep appreciation of their love and loyalty. These kindly friends may rest assured that my life and services are unalterably laid on the altar of the cause which is so dear to all white-ribboners, and I shall always try to merit the confidence the W. C. T. U. women have placed in my honesty of purpose and integrity of action. The following lines are an extract from one of the above letters, written by Mrs. Munnell, president of the W. C. T. U. of Kentucky: "We will only stand closer about you, and weave our arms so firmly together that we will shield you with our hearts." These words express very beautifully the love and loyalty with which I have been surrounded. I can only add that encircling all I have felt the Almighty arm, strong to defend and uphold. Never for one moment has my faith faltered. The Temple project has never been more prosperous. The money has come in more rapidly since this last public onslaught than ever before. To be sure it has for a couple of months upset Rev. Watson Tranter's plans, and we will not be able now to get in all the money with which to purchase the stock by June; but Mr. Tranter is maturing other plans, and is going right to work.

OUR EVOLUTION.

Like the One whose life and teachings are its guide and inspiration, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union had its forerunner. That wonderful movement known as the Temperance Crusade may be called the "John the Baptist" of the W. C. T. U. It marked the close of the old dispensation, the old temperance régime, and prepared the way for a new order of things.

The Woman's Crusade was the opening fusilade which signalized the beginning of actual combat, on the part of the home, against the liquor traffic and its attendant evils. Previous to this time the attitude of temperance people toward the saloon power had been for the most part merely defensive. There had been no organized, aggressive effort to withstand its encroachments. The drink traffic was popularly regarded as an irremediable evil only to be met on moral suasion grounds. Women endured because it did not occur to them that it could be cured. But little by little the great Leader had been preparing women for the mighty work which lay before them. The hour had come for Christian motherhood to go forth as the divine instrument in turning the "way of the wicked upside down"; the hour had come for woman to become a scourge in the hands of the Master, to drive out the desecrators of the temples of the Holy Ghost. Woman's day had dawned eighteen centuries before, and a great awakening was at hand. The saloon itself was to be a prominent factor in the bringing of woman into her kingdom. It was an evil out of which omnipotent love and wisdom purposed to bring great good.

The liquor traffic stands to-day a forcible illustration of the self-destructive power inherent in all evil. Its own voice sounded the tocsin which startled woman into action, made of her a positive instead of a negative power, and thus put in motion those forces which are daily making for its own extinction. The "home protection" idea was the inevitable outcome of saloon dominancy, which idea let loose upon this planet becomes the raison d'être of the W. C. T. U. and the destined executioner of the rum power.

December 23, 1873, is memorable in W. C. T. U. annals as the birthday of the Crusade movement. Commencing at Hillsboro, Ohio, it swept like an electric current through the Middle and Western States, while every part of the nation felt the shock. Dr. Dio Lewis was the messenger whose word vitalized the latent crusade spirit and first gave momentum to the home protection idea. What great events sometimes hinge on the smallest incident! Humanly speaking it was a mere "happen so" that the noted Boston physician and lecturer delivered his now historic temperance lecture in Hillsboro, in which he was led to suggest the crusade method of dealing with the liquor sellers. At the close of his remarks some fifty women signified their willingness to adopt his plan, while sixty or seventy men rose in response to a call for "backers."

Mrs. Eliza J. Thompson, daughter of Governor Trimble, of Ohio, a lady nearly sixty years old, was chosen leader of the first Crusade. The story of her "call," in which her son, her daughter, and the 146th Psalm figure so conspicuously, reveals unmistakably the voice of the God of Jacob. What a gathering was that in the Presbyterian church of Hillsboro on the morning of Dec. 24! How fraught with significance for humanity! After appeals had been duly drawn up for presentation to druggists, hotel and saloon-keepers, the men who were present retired, leaving the matter with God and the women. The leader read the 146th Psalm, commenting upon it in the light of the events of the morning, and every woman knelt in prayer, led by a pastor's wife. Then, singing "Give to the winds thy fears," seventy women formed in line two by two and marched forth into the street, headed for the nearest drug store. How deep must have been the provocation, how high the inspiration, which drew these timid, shrinking women from the seclusion of home to the publicity of a street parade! Women who had never before heard their own voices in prayer, found themselves kneeling in the saloon or on the sidewalk pouring out their hearts without hesitancy of thought or speech; found themselves making eloquent appeals to men on both sides of the saloon bar. Truly, "tongues of fire" had come upon these women, and come to stay.

This work was carried on daily, morning prayer-meetings and evening mass-meetings being held in the churches, until nearly all the drinking places were closed. At Washington, Ohio, where the movement started only twenty-four hours later, the enthusiasm was even more intense than at Hillsboro, other towns caught the infection with amazing rapidity, the ranks of the Crusaders increased daily, and the wildest excitement prevailed. In the words of an eye-witness, "at first men wondered, scoffed, laughed, then criticised, respected, yielded." Sometimes the women were arrested and locked up in jail, but nothing daunted they sang and prayed in the prison corridors, surrounded by the prisoners and officials.

For fifty days the Crusade fire burned fierce and high. In two hundred and fifty towns and villages the liquor traffic was practically driven out, while every state was more or less affected. It leaped the broad Atlantic, carrying inspiration to the women of England and Scotland, and even far-away India. When its intensity abated it was not to leave scattered heaps of whitened ashes to mark its pathway.

The leaping, irregular flame subsided into a steady glow which illumines the world to-day, and which as time goes on becomes more warm and brilliant and diffusive. The Crusade spirit did not die, nor even sleep; it took on new and higher form. It reappeared, a more perfect incarnation, better equipped for the Master's service and for its own further development.

In August, 1874, at Chautauqua (fitly called the birthplace of grand ideas) steps were taken to materialize the crusade thought as a permanent organization. To quote from one who officiated at its nativity, "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was born, not in a manger, but in a new board shanty on a floor of straw, in an apartment into which the daylight shone through holes and crevices." The women who projected the W. C. T. U. were terribly in earnest. To borrow a homely phrase they allowed no grass to grow under their feet. As a result of the deliberations at Chautauqua, circular letters were issued asking women's temperance societies everywhere to hold conventions and elect one woman from each congressional district as delegate to an organizing convention to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, in November. Right nobly did women respond. The Cleveland convention was in all respects a representative gathering. There the National W. C. T. U. was fully organized, ringing resolutions adopted and a plan of work set on foot out of which has grown the present organization with its forty-one different departments. Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing presided over this convention. Mrs. Annie Wittenmyer was elected National president, and Miss Frances Willard, corresponding secretary. Five years later at the Indianapolis convention, Miss Willard, representing the "liberal" element of the society, notably on the question of woman's ballot, was elected president.

The W. C. T. U. motto, "For God and Home and Native Land," was adopted first by the Chicago union, later by the Illinois W. C. T. U., and finally, in 1876, by the National. The white-ribbon badge, emblem of purity and peace, and suggestive of the inclusive character of the organization, was adopted in 1877, at the Chicago convention.

The very temporary results of Crusade effort having taught women that the saloon was an effect, not a cause, that it was a symptom of disease, not the disease itself, they began to lay plans accordingly. The new organization adopted both defensive and aggressive measures. It began to devise remedies for prevention as well as remedies for cure—whereupon an unappreciative public immediately bestowed upon them the name of "cranks."

Having learned that the saloon power had adopted a "do-everything" policy, the W. C. T. U. also "resoluted" to that effect. These women resolved to take and to hold every vantage ground; to bombard every fort in possession of the enemy; to invade every realm. Carrying out this policy, they lay claim to the home kingdom by the divine right of motherhood; they preëmpt the school land in the name of science; they take advantage of their moral and numerical standing in the church to array it on the side of home as against the saloon; they are bent on pushing the home protection idea into the social "swim"; while in the political arena this idea is the coming event which has already cast its shadow before. From the Cleveland convention, leading women from eighteen states went out to organize and to spread the glad tidings of the new gospel. Before the National W. C. T. U. had celebrated its tenth birthday every state and territory in the union was organized, and steps taken toward the formation of a World's union.

The first round-the-world missionary was sent out eight years ago, and the first World's convention was held in Boston in 1891. Thirty-four different nations are now federated against the twin evils of alcohol and opium. It may be said of the W. C. T. U. as of Queen Victoria, that the sun never sets upon its dominions.

The banyan tree has been suggested as the emblematic device of the World's W. C. T. U. A more fitting symbol of this anomaly among organizations could hardly be chosen. Like the banyan tree its branches are continually reaching out and taking root in new places; like the banyan tree it grows in every direction, and year by year covers more and more ground; like the banyan tree it is many in one, and the more divisions it has the stronger it becomes. The seed was sown in weeping, but the sowers now come up to the annual conventions with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them.

The wonderful growth and development of the W. C. T. U. organization may be summed up in the words of a resolution adopted at its first convention, "trusting in Him who is the Prince of Peace, we will meet argument with argument, misjudgment with patience, denunciation with kindness, and all our difficulties and dangers with prayer." The future has still more marvelous things in store for the W. C. T. U. Its expectations may be expressed in these words of the Master: "Oh, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

CHRISTIAN OR BARBARIAN?

The following is a quotation from a Christian Union editorial, commented upon by the New Nation, and in turn quoted by the Dawn:

"If we cannot have a perfect society, he seems to say, let us at least have an honest one; let us confess that we are not yet Christians. The constant use of the word Christian to characterize a civilization still full of barbarism is misleading and dishonest. When we cease to think of ourselves as Christian, we shall have taken the first step toward becoming, in fact, what we now are only in name. The conflict between Christianity and barbarism is still in full tide of battle; there have been great and noble gains, but the fight is won only in name. The old barbarism of selfishness, lust and cruelty lives under new names. There are thousands of churches, but there are thousands of slums as well; there are armies of professed Christians, but too many act as if there had never been a Christ, and as if the brotherhood of man and the spiritual unity of the race were myths."

"This is an admirable idea. If we cannot be Christians, let us at least be honest enough not to call ourselves such."

The suggestion that we should not call ourselves Christian as individuals or states until "we all attain unto a fullgrown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" is based upon an utterly false conception, and would be a most dangerous doctrine if there were the slightest probability that it would gain a following of any proportions. Paul did not direct the slaveholder, Philemon, to free his bondman or cease to call himself a Christian. Christ himself did not forbid His disciples to call themselves by His name, because they uttered no protest against the existing social system. There are two facts entirely lost sight of by persons who advocate the above views. One is the difference between pure and applied Christianity, the other is that we cannot refuse to conform somewhat to the existing social system in which we live. In regard to the first point, while there is almost no dispute with regard to the principles of Christianity, there is much and honest disagreement concerning the application of those principles.

Honest people and faithful Christians hold diametrically opposite views concerning the teachings of the Bible upon very many subjects: The observance of the Sabbath, the position of woman, the organization of the state; and neither party in the conflict has any right to denounce as unchristian his opponents. Both sides are earnestly desirous of bringing in the reign of the Prince of Peace when "each man's weal shall be every man's care." When the reign of selfishness shall be superseded by that of love, and the injustice, oppression and suffering of our present system shall cease; they differ as to the means by which the end shall be reached. The difference is one of judgment, not of motive. Seemingly these disputes hinder our progress and yet, because we are not omniscient, they are absolutely necessary to our reaching correct results. But more, as already said, we must, whether we will or not, conform to the existing social system. The editors of the New Nation and of the Dawn may believe in Bellamy's picture as the social system to which we are surely tending, nevertheless they are as powerless as the rest of us to put it into practice in their own lives. They are obliged to conduct their respective papers, not according to the method represented in "Looking Backward," but according to the business principles of the nineteenth century. And yet we will venture that they do not consider that they thereby forfeit the name of Christian.

For us as a nation or as individuals to disclaim the title "Christian" would be to deny our Master, as Peter did; to deny the power that has brought us as far as we are and that is inspiring every forward movement of the present. We indeed fall unutterably short as a state and as individuals of measuring up to our possibilities in Christ: even the most advanced of us all will never know how far beneath His plan our social system is until Christianity has developed a perfect Christian state. Worst of all, our human weakness and prejudices blind us often to the leadings of the Spirit even as they did the Christians of old who disputed with Peter because he "went in to men uncircumcised and did eat with them." But God who looketh upon the heart does not command us to declare ourselves therefore heathen and barbarians. As honest even though sadly mistaken children, He owns us yet, and we shall best serve His cause not by denying Him but by humbly and earnestly seeking and following to the best of our ability the truth that we may find.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquor, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

QUERY.—Is any one in Maine liable, who has liquor for his own use, under the Search and Seizure Act?

ANSWER.—He is not. He cannot be convicted unless it is proven that he kept it with intent to sell, or to aid or assist in its sale. However, under the Nuisance Act, if liquors are given away for tippling purposes, they can be seized, but liquor cannot be seized from a private house, kept for private use, unless the "peace" is in some way broken. MRS. L. M. N. STEVENS.

Q.—Please give an exegesis of the following verse found in Habakkuk 2: 15:

"Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him, and makest him drunken also, that thou mayest look on their nakedness!"

An eminent minister in the west has declared in a sermon that it has nothing to do with the traffic in, or use of strong drink, and one of our dear W. C. T. U. women is greatly distressed therefrom.

A.—In reply, let me say that when Habakkuk prophesied, the Chaldeans were in Jerusalem, cruelly trampling down everything with irresistible force—covetousness and rapacity, cruelty and wrong toward the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that they might aggrandize themselves. The conquest and destruction of weaker nations and idolatry, characterized their invasion.

The Prophet, from his watch-tower, utters a weighty oracle concerning the future and the overthrow of the Chaldeans. In five parts he treats and illustrates their five special sins. In speaking of their delight in the conquest and destruction of civilized nations, he compares it to a man who rejoices to make his neighbor drunk with poisoned wine, that he may feast his eyes upon his helplessness and nakedness, but he shall experience the same in his own person, if he thus give the cup of stupefaction and shame. Thus it is primarily an illustration in this case. But to say it has no allusion to the sin of drinking and offering the cup to others, is surely a wrong exegesis. The very reason this illustration is used is because wine and drunkenness, insolence and pride, are crying sins of the Chaldeans, of whom the prophet is speaking, and hence his illustration is selected in order that this much needed lesson may be enforced. This is not only my view but that of Dr. August Von Ewald, the prince of Expositions and of many others.

ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD,
National Supt. Evangelistic Work.

Q.—If the president of a local union resigns may the union elect another to fill the vacancy, or must the vice-president serve until the annual meeting?

A.—Most constitutions specify when officers shall be elected. In the absence of such constitutional provision the usual method is for the vice-president to serve till the annual meeting.

Q.—What is the position taken by the National union in regard to the Keeley cure?

A.—It has never taken any action but does not oppose it.

Q.—Do you think a person believing in the Republican party can conscientiously belong to a loyal union?

A.—The very test of loyalty in the W. C. T. U. is belief in total abstinence and prohibition. Every person must decide questions of conscience for themselves.

Q.—Will you please inform us whether if we have ten paying members and five non-paying members we are entitled to more than one delegate?

A.—Non-paying members do not count in any way and therefore do not make a basis for representation in any convention, county, district, state or National.

Q.—Have local unions in any one state a right to send out appeals for aid to other states?

A.—No. At the Minneapolis convention held in 1886, the following resolution was passed: "That no communication from National superintendents relative to finance shall be sent to local unions, unless first approved by the general officers of the state or territory to which sent." The letter of this resolution does not apply to other than those mentioned but the spirit covers all who would appeal for funds, National and state officers as well as local unions.

Q.—The National Constitution (Art. III, Sec. 2) says: "General officers, superintendents of departments, chairmen of standing committee and ex-officio members shall vote in person." Who are ex-officio members and what does this mean in view of the first part of Section 4 which reads, "Each delegate may fill its quota by visiting members from its own State, etc?"

A.—General officers (viz., president, corresponding secretary, recording and assistant recording secretaries and treasurer), superintendents of departments, chairmen of standing committees, are not ex-officio members, because they are elected by the National Convention to fill certain offices, and because they are so elected for these offices, which sustain to the National union a certain relation, their places cannot be filled by others not so elected and not filling places so related.

"Each delegation" is elected by "its own state" from among its membership to represent that state in another body, and if one thus elected fails to attend, others, chosen from "the visiting members," may be put in such vacant place. The work which these delegates represent is a varied one, and not special as that of general officers, superintendents or chairmen of committee.

Ex-officio members are those who, holding office by election in one body, are therefore constituted officers in another. These in the National W. C. T. U. are state presidents (who are National vice-presidents,) state corresponding and recording secretaries and treasurer, editor, associate editor and publisher of the official organ, editor of books and publications and business manager of the W. T. P. A. and the president's private secretary. These must vote in person, and their places, if vacant, cannot be filled from the general membership.

IN a recent letter to Miss Willard, Sho Nemoto says (having in a previous sentence spoken of the significance of the message, "universal sympathy," sent by Minister Coombs), "I know Japan did for her because her work was so great, reaching the hearts of 40,000,000 souls in some way directly or indirectly. Universal sympathy are the strongest and most forceful words, and I see it is not nominal but real." A beautiful attestation that Miss West's mission will indeed and in truth prove fruit-bearing is the following statement from the same earnest writer: "Miss Denton, of Kioto, is planning to make a collection of Miss West's work and she is a good temperance worker and I expect to make some arrangement for the work in next summer vacation. She wishes to go to different places and tell more about the work and harvest the seed sown by Miss West."

God did not make the world out of nothing, but He had material beforehand, and He said, "Let there be light."

There is a small cloud on the horizon. We read that in the olden time it was not bigger than a man's hand; to day we change the metaphor, and say it is just as large as a woman's hand, which shall grow and gather force until the storm shall burst on the liquor traffic, and great and final shall that storm be!

I have no hard words for the saloon-keeper; he is the strap to the razor; he is the wind of the oak; he is the outcome of a bad civilization, and—worst of all—he is born blind. A man came to the ticket window of Barnum's museum and said he thought he ought to be let in free, because he was born blind; another wanted to be admitted at half price, because he had only one eye. In like manner these men (and on no other ground) are pleading with society to-day not to disown them, but to let them into its great museum of civilization. But we must deal with their eyes, do our best to make them see, and if that is impossible, they must be shut up in an asylum, foreordained for the like of them.

ON DUTY.

WISCONSIN WORKERS.

"Live for something! Have a purpose!
And that purpose keep in view;
Drifting like a helmless vessel,
Thou canst ne'er to self be true."

Our state president, Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, keeps a watchful lookout over the fields, attending conventions and giving lectures, thereby engendering continual activity.

Our state organizer, Miss Lois Russell, has been busy through the winter, and we feel as greatly encouraged by the increase of interest and knowledge of the principles championed by the W. C. T. U. as by the additions to our ranks.

Miss Russell also organizes Y's or L. T. L's where possible, visits unions wishing instruction in any of the departments and conducts schools of methods.

The superintendents of the various departments are with few exceptions unusually active and practical. The L. T. L. work prospers wherever a leader can be found; the children are never lacking. A Legion of one hundred members was organized at Stoughton, and two gentlemen of that city immediately offered to pay the expenses to the state L. T. L. convention, held in July, at Ashland, in the northern part of the state, of the two members passing the best examination. An L. T. L. county convention was held in St. Croix county. The subject of one of the graduating essays was "Womanhood," another, "Education."

The Racine L. T. L. reports a "yarn social." Each person upon entering the room was given a card having a number upon it. When a number was called the person who held that number was required to sing a song, tell a story, give a recitation or pay ten cents. It was very enjoyable and was a help financially also. The L. T. L. at Delavan prepared a program on the subject of mercy for a Sunday union meeting of the churches.

Tobacco essay contests are being pushed, meeting with appreciative audiences wherever they are held. In these contests original essays are read in place of selected recitations; a first and second prize is given and the remaining contestants receive a bouquet of flowers or some souvenir.

Our superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, Mrs. Jennie E. Kinmore, has been able, in addition to her correspondence, to lecture in several places and is causing that "arrest of thought" along this line which is sure to lead to action.

The superintendent of Sunday-school work, Mrs. Emma M. Brewster, has made great effort, by her pen and through the columns of The Motor, to create enthusiasm in regard to circulating the autograph pledge cards for the World's Fair, with what result a few weeks will tell.

The W. C. T. U., in some parts of the state, has become a power for good at the county fairs, and when we have our new building on the state fair grounds, in Milwaukee, as our superintendent, Mrs. C. S. Langdell, has faith to believe we will, who can estimate the great good that will go out from thence; the leaves (of literature) being "for the healing of the people."

Our lumberman's work also prospers, and this year our missionary has not been compelled to go on foot when he could not "catch a ride," but has had the use of a horse and sleigh, with a man to assist in the song service. This was made possible through the generosity of the King's Daughters of New York. The superintendent, Mrs. Wm. Upham, is very enthusiastic in this work, and indeed, the soil seems to be very fertile, only waiting for the seed to become a productive garden for the Lord.

Our hearts grow warm and tender when we think of the W. C. T. U. home for unfortunate women at Eau Claire. Under the able management of its financial secretary, Mrs. L. A. Doolittle, and Dr. Annette Shaw, chairman of its board of managers, it has become an assured power for good. It stands beyond the reach of calumny for its books show that ninety-five per cent of its beneficiaries have gone back to the world with better ideas of the duties and possibilities of life and are good citizens of our Badger state. A house with several lots has been purchased this year for the home and we are asking contributions toward the purchase money from those outside our unions, who are interested in rescue work.

Mrs. K. S. Lewis, our evangelistic superintendent, although in poor health, has been greatly blessed in her work. This department is the most important one and the less attention we give to it, the farther away we are from our base of supplies. Demorest contests still prove an excellent medium for reaching the people. Several of our unions have had an "old folks" contest and find it a success financially as well as otherwise. Space will not allow further mention of work accomplished.

Mrs. Helen G. Rice, of Boston, gave thirty-five lectures in this state, coming here after the National Convention. Every one is pleased with her, and feel that her lectures have given a great incentive to juvenile work. Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt also visited us, and, although many unions could not have the great pleasure of hearing her, those who were so fortunate rejoice.

Since my last letter the following unions have mourned the "going on before" of one of their number: Utter's Corners, Mrs. H. U. Waters; Albion, Mrs. Delia Carter; Sparta, Mrs. Z. M. Tyler; La Crosse, Mrs. C. A. Matthews; Stoughton, Miss Caroline Nelson; Baraboo, Mrs. Lucretia Lawson; North Freedom, Mrs. Louisa Starin. "Their works do follow them."

LEGISLATIVE.

Every two years our state is thrown into a turmoil over the election of state officers. The presidential election being added to the ingredients in the pot that is always ready to "boil and bubble," strange was the mixture. At last, however, the Democratic party disengaged itself and came forth triumphant. "Oh," you exclaim, "then the majority of the voters in Wisconsin are Democrats!" By no means. The Democratic party continued in power for the reason that more votes were cast by that party than by any other one party among the several into which our voters are divided. Thus we have the spectacle of the minority making laws for the majority. How many states are in the same condition, and is the proverb, "The voice of the people is the voice of God," true in such cases, if ever?

Among the bills introduced of particular interest to us, is one for a woman's reformatory with an appropriation of $50,000. This, as also the anti-tobacco bill and a bill removing the saloons from within one mile of the state university were introduced through the efforts of our legislative superintendent, Dr. Annette J. Shaw, who is also National superintendent of heredity. A bill striking out the prohibitory clause in the law giving state aid to state and county fairs has passed the Assembly, but such a storm of protest has come from all parts of the state that it is thought the senate will not concur in it.

The members of the German Turnverein, of Milwaukee, have sent in a bill giving physical culture to the students in city schools. The bill to establish a hospital for dipsomaniacs (drunkards), and to provide for the care and cure of the same, gives a per cent of the license money for maintaining the hospital. To a practical mind, it seems absurd to give any one the liberty to make drunkards upon the payment of a certain sum, and then use a part of that sum to cure them. It is much to be deplored that some of this sympathy (so-called) for the drunkard could not overflow in the direction of his wife and children, and take into account all the misery they endure during the years of his "cramming" preparatory to his "graduation" from the hospital. The bright spot in the horizon is, that when drunkenness is generally acknowledged to be a disease, the place where it is contracted will soon come under the ban of law.

A joint resolution striking out the word male from the constitution and a bill bringing the question before the people for decision were introduced in the Assembly by men who, without solicitation, decided to do so because they believed in it. When the committee came to consider these bills the room was so crowded that the chairman adjourned the meeting to the Assembly chamber, where an intelligent audience listened to the speeches made by Mrs. Charlton and Mrs. Rose, of Brodhead, Mrs. Nellie Opdale, Racine, Dr. Annette J. Shaw, Eau Claire, and Rev. Ella E. Bartlett, Madison. The ladies were treated with great courtesy and listened to with respect. The committee reported unfavorably upon the bill with one dissenting vote. A motion to adopt the minority vote was made with the request that it be made a special order for the evening. The speaker kindly granted this, at which time three members, Messrs. Tucker, McGillivray and Burdick made speeches in behalf of equal suffrage, which reflected great credit upon themselves, not only as thinkers but as speakers, and earned the gratitude of every woman in the land, although some may not realize it.

A bouquet of beautiful roses tied with ribbon was presented by the ladies to each of these gentlemen. On a call for the ayes and nays the vote was lost by a large majority, but that does not discourage us for this movement is right and will succeed.

Rev. Ella E. Bartlett, of this city, acted as chaplain for two weeks in the Senate and Assembly, the resident clergy of the city officiating in turn, a certain sum being appropriated to pay for such services. Miss Bartlett's ministerial services in both houses was praised even by the most conservative. We can all be thankful, for she "is one of us" and what conduces to her merit elevates all womanhood.

UTAH UNIONS.

Some of our recently organized unions have been doing excellent work this winter. Logan reports a membership of fifty, with a Loyal Temperance Legion numbering 107. The latter is under the able superintendence of Mrs. H. A. Jones, who has been, ever since her coming to Utah, an earnest worker among the children.

The union meetings, under the leadership of the president, Mrs. Eddy, formerly of Salt Lake City, are well attended and full of interest and enthusiasm. One of the members writes: "Our president is surely the right woman in the right place." The ladies have been giving white-ribbon teas, socials, entertainments and public meetings, and have awakened an unusual degree of public interest in their work, and in the W. C. T. U. principles.

Nephi organized in September with a membership of nine, has now twenty-four regular and ten honorary members, and has secured 125 signers to the pledge. The ladies have given receptions and public meetings and a medal contest, and have organized a Loyal Temperance Legion of forty-five members. They are carrying on six branches of work, and entering heartily into the spirit of it. The corresponding secretary, Miss Kate Johnson, writes: "The W. C. T. U. has proved a great blessing to us, bringing us nearer together in this common cause. We are glad we organized. It is doing us all so much good to be in touch with this great movement."

Salt Lake City was the first in the territory to organize a union. It has a membership of fifty, numbering among its workers some of the most devoted souls I have ever known. Every Sunday for five years meetings have been held in the city and county jails, and messages of love and warning carried to those in sorest need. In this way from seventy-five to one hundred are reached every week. Some of them are women. They are provided with respectable clothes in which to appear when their time is out, and are supplied with homes or with work until they can again gain for themselves a place in the world. Nearly every Sunday some sign the pledge, and reports are received from many of these after years of upright, honest living. This work is in charge of Mrs. Sarah Reed and Mrs. Mary Grant Major.

Gospel meetings have been held for a year and a half in the W. C. T. U. coffee house, and the same meetings are now continued in the rescue mission rooms, which are an enlargement of that effort to meet the need of the poor working class. For four months, during which services were held every evening, our evangelistic superintendent, Mrs. E. Griffith, reports an attendance aggregating 5,000, 375 signers to the pledge, and the conversion of seventy. She receives, almost daily, letters from these men, expressing gratitude for what was done for them in these meetings and telling of temptations resisted. The average attendance now in the mission rooms is seventy-five, services being held every evening. Truly, as one of the men writes: "The good of which they are productive can never be estimated in this world." Sunday night is special W. C. T. U. service, and is now in charge of our local president, Miss E. Turner, who, as one of her co-workers writes, is "ever ready to be used by the Lord."

The jail and hospital work is carried on in Ogden under the superintendence of Mrs. Harriet P. Hunter, chaplain of the local union, and Mrs. Day. "Mother" Hunter, as she is known by Ogden white-ribboners, was one of those who helped to "fight the good fight" in Iowa, and brings to her work a clear and cultured mind, great power of speech and devotion of heart and soul.

An important branch of the work in Salt Lake City is that among the soldiers at Fort Douglas. Starting a year ago with one earnest woman and two young men, the Soldiers' Temperance union now has a membership of over forty, and is the center of the best moral and social influence the fort knows. Literary programs are rendered every fortnight in the fort chapel, while on alternate fortnights, receptions are given the "boys in blue" in the homes of some one of the many white-ribbon friends they have won for themselves in the city. The boys are very grateful for the taste of home life, which forms a bright contrast to the somewhat dreary monotony of the camp and barracks, and by their courtesy and gentlemanly bearing render the position of hostess a pleasant one.

For the benefit of many Utah readers of THE UNION SIGNAL who have asked for a list of our officers and superintendents since our printed copies were exhausted, I will ask you to publish the following

MASSACHUSETTS.

BY THE WAYSIDE.

The old Bay State has been for so long a time absent from these columns that some word of explanation is due. She has by no means relaxed her zeal and vigilance in the great work, but her reporter has been forced to pass through the experience of a severe illness, which has held her pen in check and forbidden that some of the best of Massachusetts' happenings should find chronicle in THE UNION SIGNAL. With returning strength comes the eager desire to once more sit down with my comrades in the cozy chat of our Field News. How true it is that work never seems so blessed as when one is taking it up after an enforced idleness. Never before have I so fully realized the depth and scope of our mission; never so gladly and triumphantly given myself to its fulfillment. Sisters, it is good to "belong."

Legislative work has claimed preëminence in the state union during the winter months. By the advice of several of our friends in the legislature, we, this year, narrowed our requests to two only, municipal suffrage and that the age of consent be raised from fourteen to eighteen years. It cost quite a struggle to intermit, even for one year, our perennially fresh petition that the prohibitory statute of Massachusetts should be reënacted, but having been assured that the number of petitions presented militated strongly against the granting of any, it was finally decided to give up what was, after all, only a form; realizing that, if municipal suffrage were granted, it would be the surest way to secure a prohibitory statute.

Into our suffrage work this year was put much careful effort. Letters were sent to each local union, giving the names of their senator and representative, and urging that an immediate interview be held, or at least a letter written asking their support of the bill. The majority of the unions complied. Influential men all over the state were also written to and the same request made.

The state union joined with the New England and Massachusetts suffrage societies, with the "Independent Women Voters," and the "Loyal Women of American Liberty," in presenting a uniform bill.

On February 1 a hearing was granted in the historic "Blue Room" of the state house. It was more than filled, every available inch of standing room being occupied. Mr. H. B. Blackwell conducted the hearing, introducing Mrs. Julia Ward Howe as first speaker. The other speakers were Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. A. J. Gordon, Mrs. Stevenson, Mrs. Lucy Stone, Miss Blackwell, Mrs. E. Trask Hill, Rev. Louis A. Banks, a lady from Canada, the mayor of Lynn, one of the representatives, and several others, who made short addresses.

The interest of the day, however, centered not so much in the addresses of the petitioners as in the presence of one lone remonstrant—a Mrs. Farmer, of West Newton,—who came to oppose and who was heard at intervals during the debate. She brought forth the old long answered arguments with a simple faith in their undying forcefulness, which was truly refreshing. It was all so irresistibly funny; one really felt a genuine sympathy for those who could not be there. Nothing else could have added such a piquancy to what is apt, through constant repetition to become a mere form. It was difficult to realize, as one listened, that we were living in the latter years of the nineteenth century. Mrs. Farmer's arguments were marked with the same disregard of fact and dearth of logic, even with the same lack of refinement which characterized the arguments of the opponents of woman's suffrage in the earliest days of the movement.

But it was worth something to see the calm way with which Mrs. Livermore and Miss Blackwell demolished her "facts" (?) while the little ripples of appreciative laughter showed how thoroughly the audience entered into the spirit of the scene. A reporter, not fully converted to woman's suffrage, said to me at the close, "She did you much more good than harm"; while some one else declared that the suffragists could well afford to pay her a salary for speaking against us because of the converts she must, unquestionably, make to the cause.

On February 21 the question came up for discussion in the house. The galleries were packed, and seats were even placed for ladies in front of the speaker's platform. After an animated debate the vote was taken, resulting in 88 yeas and 97 nays, with 18 pairs.

It was the nearest approach to a victory the cause has yet had in Massachusetts, still our hopes were so confidently claiming a full victory that the disappointment is a very keen one. It seems strange that man's injustice can so long bar God's purposes, and yet we know that

"Right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin."

Our work for the advance in the age of consent is not yet completed, and will form the subject matter of the next Massachusetts letter.

In response to Miss Greenwood's appeal several of the Massachusetts unions have asked the pastors to preach upon the subject of temperance, offering to supply lady speakers if wished. The response in some places has been most flattering. In Fall River especially, nine churches asked that speakers be furnished them. Mrs. Abby F. Rolfe spoke there three times on February 19. Mrs. Fessenden, Mrs. McLaughlin, and others, filled other pulpits March 19. Taunton, Attleboro, and several other places have adopted the plan. This is one of the very best suggestions which has come from our National evangelistic superintendent, and ought to become an established feature in each year's work.

Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason gave the month of February to work in Massachusetts, speaking in Barnstable, Plymouth, Bristol and Hampden counties. The weather was, without question, the severest Massachusetts has known for many years; in several places she was unable to fulfill her engagements, owing to the severity of the storm. Nevertheless she made the trip without financial loss to the state, and organized three or four new unions, which seem likely to prove of hardy growth. Mrs. Gleason is a woman of marvelous force and strength of purpose, and the thing she sets out to do is the thing which is more than likely to be accomplished.

The no-license campaign in the towns is drawing heavily upon the forces of our speakers. On a recent Sunday evening we had every woman in the field, and the calls are not likely to diminish until the last No vote is recorded. The prohibition sentiment, as revealed through local option, is more clearly defined than ever this year. Of sixty-six towns recently voting, forty-nine went No. Our unions are taking a brave part in the fight. Westfield, which has never had a No vote under the new law, rejoices in one now, and a Boston daily paper states that a large share of the praise is due to the women of the town. South Framingham did valiant work, but lost the vote by a majority of about fifty. Natick, an adjoining town, is carrying the battle to the gates. The recent convention of Middlesex county was held there, and a large part of the program was given up to a no-license symposium. Now mass-meetings are being held, and literature distributed broadcast.

After one year of license régime the town feels that no price is too great to pay for a rousing No vote. The returns will all be in before my next letter, and I hope to be able to show by the unanswerable logic of figures, an advance in prohibitory sentiment throughout the state.

When Miss Fessenden was forced to lay down her work through ill-health, there was a general feeling among our women, "How can her place be supplied?" She combined so many rare gifts that one might well be excused for trembling for the welfare of the work she abandoned. It is therefore with special delight that the fitness of the new state Y secretary, Mrs. Myra L. Higgins, is being recognized. Coming into the position under especially trying circumstances she is proving her choice to have been a providential one, and is rapidly showing to the girls that they can make room in their hearts for a new leader without in any way surrendering their allegiance to the old. Four new Y's have been organized since state convention: Florence, Osterville, Brookton and Adams, while Salisbury, New Bedford, Provincetown and Westfield are on the eve of organization.

Another feature of this year's work has been the organization of Somerset Y's in seminaries and colleges. The branch at Wellesley College has existed for several years and has done good work. Recently Mrs. Fessenden organized another at Mt. Holyoke College; while Lasell Seminary, at Auburndale, has just swung into line with thirty-three members. Efforts are now to be made to effect an entrance into Smith College and Boston University. A college Y column is to be started in Our Message, and much is hoped for from this new phase of our work.

Indeed, Miss Willard's pet scheme of a Somerset union in America, to correspond with the Willard union in England, bids fair to have so favorable a trial in Massachusetts as to win its way into the next National Convention without opposition. Special envelopes of invitation have been printed, which are distributed in public meetings, and quite often those who would not think they could join a working union are drawn into the ranks and don the white ribbon in this way, "That by all means I may win some."

The Mary A. Livermore bust fund is another matter which is never forgotten by our state president, and which is growing slowly, but surely, to some adequate proportion of the necessary amount. To say that Miss Anne Whitney is the sculptor is to insure satisfaction, even to those who most love and admire her great subject. It has occurred to me that there may be Massachusetts men and women living in other states who would esteem it a great privilege to help in this enterprise. If so, if they will forward all contributions to Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden, 171 Tremont St., Boston, Mass., they will be duly and gratefully acknowledged.

The possession in which state headquarters feels most pride—and with reason—is a new crayon portrait of Miss Willard, life size, of exquisite tone and finish. It is the work of one of our own women, Miss M. A. Gregory, of the Boston union, an artist of great ability, who has put into this work not only skill, but love. It were almost worth a journey to Boston to see this pictured face of our chieftain. But we rejoice in the hope that we shall soon see herself in the flesh, rested and refreshed, we trust, and not in the least spoiled by all this ovation the mother country has been making in her honor. By the way, when we thus honored Lady Henry Somerset, we were said by certain kindly newspapers to be "toadying to the British aristocracy." To what aristocracy is England "toadying" in doing Miss Willard an even greater honor? Thank God that both countries are coming to recognize the aristocracy of heart and brain and God-inspired purpose!

AN L. T. L. SLEIGHRIDE AND OTHER NEWS.

The Loyal Temperance Legion of Portland enjoyed a pleasant sleighride this winter. The members who were regular attendants at the meetings were given tickets and were conveyed in a large bus which bore on one side the motto, "Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up," and on the other the legend, "Co. K., L. T. L." The sleigh was drawn by four horses and was decorated with flags.

Portland union had a very full attendance at its Sunday evening meeting in Temple of Honor hall not long ago, which was addressed by Mr. Swan, city missionary of Norwich, Conn. The union is in a flourishing condition, just having added several members to its list.

Mrs. Marvin, president of Middlesex county W. C. T. U., has instituted a series of interesting gatherings called "group meetings." The first one was held in Middlefield, Wednesday, March 1. Portland, Rockfall and Durham unions, Portland, Middlefield and Rockfall Y sent delegates, and a most delightful time was enjoyed. The Methodist church was prettily decorated for the occasion with flowers and banners and the following short program was carried out:

Anthem by choir, "Wine is a mocker."
Reading, Psalm 69, by Mrs. Marvin.
Prayer by Rev. W. Warden, pastor of the church.
Song by choir, "Forth to the rescue."
Welcome, Mrs. Marvin, for the union.
Welcome, Rev. Warden, for the church.
Responses, Mrs. O. A. Smith, for Rockfall, Miss Culver, for Portland, Mrs. Peck, for Middletown.
Recitation, Miss Ivy Terrill, of Middlefield Y.
Solo, Mrs. Marvin.
Recitation, Miss Etta Asten, of Rockfall Y.
Collection for free-will offering.

The company was then invited down stairs where a bountiful tea had been prepared and the rest of the afternoon was devoted to sociability. The ladies united in declaring it a very pleasant occasion.

The Rockfall Y held its free-will offering meeting recently in the Union chapel and prepared a short program, consisting of singing and recitations by members and an excellent address by Rev. W. Warden, of the Middlefield M. E. church. Later the W. C. T. U. held a pleasant service in the same place. Several hymns were sung, a Psalm was read by Rev. J. Nott of the Congregational church. He made an earnest prayer and then introduced Deacon Edwin Augur, of Middletown, who is by no means a stranger in Rockfall. His statements were convincing and sincere. Temperance always has an earnest advocate, not only in word but in deed in Brother Augur. When this good friend was kind enough to walk six miles for the purpose of helping in this meeting, no doubt can exist in a reasonable mind as to his interest in the subject.

Rev. Nott supplemented the address of Mr. Augur by a short talk regarding the effect of drinking habits on a man's external appearance showing pictures of the "sober" and "drinking" hat, coat and boots and closing by showing pictures of a bottle of old rye and an ice-water tank and asking the audience to choose the more desirable. A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Augur, and the meeting was closed by singing the W. C. T. U. parting hymn, "God be with you till we meet again."

Good living

doesn't come from riches. It comes first, and brings riches. While the poor man walks, he will stay poor. His prosperity begins when he rides, and eats a good dinner, and carries a good watch. A "poor" watch is the very badge of poverty, worse than none; but either condition is too expensive for a poor man: he can't afford to lose the time of day. Keeping that under his thumb, he may yet be wealthy. Then comes true economy: diamonds for his wife; a man to guard them. But still, for his own pocket, the same trusty watch that "made" him: the quick-winding Waterbury.

BUSY BUILDERS.

We are busily holding our county conventions, getting ready for the state convention, which meets in June, at Puyallup. Pierce county held its annual convention in the parlors of the First Presbyterian church, Tacoma, March 8 and 9. Twenty-six delegates were in attendance, representing all the unions in the county, excepting two. The convention opened with devotional exercises, conducted by Mrs. D. S. Garlick, of Tacoma, and were of a character to put all present in the best possible frame of mind for the work which was to follow.

In a few well-chosen words, Mrs. M. Brown, of Tacoma union, gave the visiting delegates a cordial welcome. Mrs. N. J. Caskin, of Puyallup, responded by saying that while the delegates were quite indifferent as to the entertainment of their bodies, they did crave a feast of good things for their hearts and minds that would make them wiser, stronger and better able to carry on the work of the W. C. T. U. throughout the county, and trusted that this convention might be a stepping-stone toward a higher plane of thought and work. Mrs. J. W. Lee, county president, then gave her annual address, which briefly reviewed the work of the past year, and gave helpful suggestions for the work of the future.

The report of the corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. P. Spinning, gave items of information concerning the different unions, and stated that a new union had recently been organized at Edison. Mrs. Mary F. Beaver, of Lynden, state superintendent of evangelistic work, was present during the whole of the convention, and by her earnest words made the fact impressive that the whole structure of this great work is built upon a gospel foundation. Mrs. M. A. Shaffer, state president, was also present during the convention, and gave efficient aid in many ways. At the close of the first session the convention adjourned for the noon hour and repaired to an adjoining room where a bountiful lunch, prepared by the members of the Tacoma union, was served.

The afternoon session opened with devotional exercises by Mrs. Brown, of Tacoma, after which reports of committees and vice-presidents were heard. The department of suffrage was given particular attention and the convention was nearly a unit in the resolve never to cease working for the right to the ballot until it was obtained. Reports from the various unions showed that most of them were wide awake, and working at whatsoever their hands find to do. Miss F. Bunnell, of Puyallup, gave a bright and interesting chalk talk to the children who gathered for the purpose. The feature of the evening session was a spirited address by Rev. W. J. Barger, pastor of the Old Tacoma M. E. Church, and a staunch Prohibitionist. A pleasing part of the evening program was the music, which was in charge of Mrs. Eva R. Hunt, and consisted of a quartet, from "White Ribbon Vibrations," sung with spirit and expression, two very charming solos by Miss Jennie McGinness, and instrumental duets by Mrs. D. S. Garlick and Prof. Davenport. Mrs. Beaver recited an original poem which was well received, and Mrs. Nickerson gave a pithy little poem entitled the "Two Ballots," one being the ballot of a jolly old brewer, the other of a Sunday-school man, and we wish all Sunday-school men could learn the lesson conveyed, as the close association of the two ballots was depicted.

Thursday morning preparation was made for the day's duties by devotional exercises led by Mrs. Talmadge, after which the time was devoted to reports of superintendents, which showed increasing interest in several departments, and much work done. Mrs. A. E. Saunders, of Tacoma, presented the subject of property rights of women, which elicited quite a discussion and suggestions for efforts to improve existing state laws in this respect. The first hour of the afternoon session was devoted to a service in memory of those so recently gathered home, Miss Mary Allen West and Jennie Casseday. A brief address in memory of Miss West was made by Rev. B. F. Rattray, who had been her friend for many years, and he paid a tender tribute to her work and worth since early womanhood. He was followed in his remarks by others who had known her personally and loved her dearly. Tender words were also spoken of the saintly life of Jennie Casseday, and we could well imagine that the time foretold in a poem in THE UNION SIGNAL a few months ago, dedicated to Miss Casseday, was now to her a glad reality, and that

"She beheld with wonder
As they entered the sunset gate
Her name on sheaves rich and golden
That were gathered early and late.
And the Master smiled approval
And He said, when she meekly came,
'Thine is the crown of the toilers
Who gathered for me in thy name.'
And the bells of heaven were ringing
While the angel choir was singing
'He has come.'"

Thi sservice closed with a beautiful solo, sweetly sung by Mrs. Cozine, "He gives his loved ones sleep."

The business of the convention was then resumed. A paper on the work of the White Shield Home was read by Mrs. M. E. Turrell, president of the board of managers of that institution, which is a home for tempted and fallen women and girls, and it is under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. of Western Washington. Mrs. Turrell made an especial plea that Christian women take greater interest in girls with whom they are brought in contact, and that a constant and determined effort be made to reach those who are in danger or have fallen into sin. The treasurer's report showed funds on hand to pay all bills and leave a balance in the treasury. The election of officers resulted in the choice of Mrs. Croake, of Tacoma, for president; Miss Cole, of Sumner, for recording secretary; Mrs. E. P. Spinning, of Puyallup, corresponding secretary, and Miss Putnam, of Steilacoom, treasurer. After adopting resolutions expressing pronounced views on the suffrage question, the purity of the press and other subjects, the convention joined in singing the temperance doxology, and was declared adjourned.

The semi-annual convention of Chehalis county was held at Elma in the M. E. church February 1. The afternoon session was opened by Mrs. O. M. Murphy, county president, who called upon Mrs. Dr. Coleman to conduct the devotional exercises. Then followed the appointing of the various committees. The address of welcome was given by Mrs. D. F. Byles, of Elma, and the response by Mrs. Simpson, of Montesano. There were delegates representing six unions in the county. Hoquiam reported fifteen members at the beginning of the year and have added eight since. They have held twenty regular meetings, with an average attendance of ten, and one gospel temperance meeting. They gave three socials which netted over sixty dollars, the last one being a "spelling" social. A reading-room is kept open at an expense of six dollars per month. Two sermons on Sabbath observance have been preached, holding union services on both occasions; literature on the subject being distributed at the close of the services. Literature was distributed also among the Chinese. The L. T. L. numbers one hundred and ten, mostly girls; boys over twelve or fourteen they find hard to hold and interest.

Their superintendent of flower mission reports flowers sent to the hospital and to all the sick in town, not neglecting the children. She wrote to Miss Casseday who replied in a beautiful letter containing specimen cards. They are preparing to begin work by Easter. Many ladies send in flowers. Many thanks are due Mrs. McGregor for sending regularly from her home in Melbourne such lovely flowers. It was most gratifying to note the expressions of the patients as their eyes feasted on these bright messengers from God's beautiful world outside. One man in particular, a victim of consumption, seemed especially delighted, but ere many visits of the flower committee had gladdened his weary life here, the death angel came and bore his freed spirit away to roam at will the regions of perennial sunshine and glory in full communion with Him who "so clothed the grass of the field." From the hospital to heaven, what a glorious change! Mrs. Chamberlain, Mrs. Haynes and other ladies have undertaken to supply all ships leaving the docks with good literature to be distributed among the sailors, and it is received joyfully.

Cosmopolis reported thirteen regular meetings, four gospel meetings and two indignation meetings; as a result of the latter, women of questionable reputation were prevented from taking up their abode in the town. Montesano union has distributed 1,578 pages of literature in five months, also ninety-six pages song leaflets and twenty-five UNION SIGNALS. Hoquiam union has sent a bundle of literature each week to logging camps. Oakville reported a Loyal Temperance Legion with a membership of forty-one, which meets the first and third Sundays of each month.

After these various reports were read and discussed, the convention adjourned until evening. The evening session was opened with singing by the male quartette of Elma. Rev. A. Anderson delivered a very able address which was followed with singing by the children and a recitation by Miss Nellie Eckart. Mesdames Murphy, Coleman, Burch, Criss and Miss France made short addresses. Thursday morning the devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Gillies, of Elma. After hearing several papers written by the delegates from local unions, the resolution committee reported the usual number of good resolutions which we are happy to say the W. C. T. U. is usually faithful in putting into practice. Mrs. Emma Barrett, an evangelist, and a dear white-ribboner, is holding revival meetings in various sections with wonderful success. She spent some weeks in Seattle, then at Kent and soon she will go to Olympia. Her home is Port Townsend.

The Prohibitionists of King county celebrated Washington's birthday by holding a banquet and jubilee in the afternoon, in the parlors of the Methodist Protestant church. The W. C. T. U. of Seattle provided and served the refreshments. Plates were laid for one hundred and twenty-five guests, but many more were present. Speeches and music were the order of the day. Mrs. Franc Lee, president of Seattle W. C. T. U., responded to the toast, "Our Allies," and was especially complimented by the daily press.

The reports from Clark county are not all they could wish, but two unions and a Y are holding the fort. The La Camas union through their energy and influence have kept saloons from their town.

"'Tis weary watching wave on wave.
And yet the tide heaves onward;
We climb like corals, grain on grain,
And build a path that's sunward.
We're beaten back in many a fray,
Yet newer strength we borrow;
And where the vanguard rests to-day
The rear shall rest to-morrow."

A CHEERING union county convention planned for and presided over by Mrs. A. R. Riggs, Oregon's W. C. T. U. president, was held at Ashland, Ore., recently. The devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. A. P. Mead, state evangelist; helpful papers were read and stirring addresses were delivered each evening, the convention proving a mutual benefit to the local workers and delegates.

THE records of the work of Col. James Holt, temperance revivalist, during three months' labors in Illinois show that 352 members have been added through his instrumentality to the Illinois W. C. T. U., not less than 2,500 have signed the pledge, one W. C. T. U., three Y's, and two Home Protection Clubs have been organized and the children drilled and trained. After the close of a fortnight's meetings at Springfield, Mo., in April, he will be ready again for work in Illinois for the summer and fall months.

THE New York State Woman Suffrage Association is making an effort to secure an enrollment of the citizens of the state, men and women, who believe in the principle of woman suffrage and asks that local W. C. T. U's of that state, whether they have franchise superintendents or not, take this up as a part of their work. Where lecturers are hard to get, there is no better way to agitate the subject than circulating the enrollment and much good missionary work may be done by means of it. Once secured, the names will make a most convincing argument with the legislators at Albany, when woman suffrage measures come up for consideration.

MARY ALLEN WEST SCHOOL OF METHODS.

No better thought has come to any of our workers in relation to our beloved editor, Miss Mary Allen West, than that the school of methods founded by our Southern sisters in Asheville, North Carolina, should bear her honored name. The women of the South are full of enthusiasm and earnestness, but like ourselves they need special drill in the methods that have developed in the last twenty years. Miss West was, more than any other one among us, the chief in setting forth these methods to the great army of American womanhood. She went to Asheville to conduct the school in 1889, and made a strong impression on the women of the South. Shall we not each and all send either from our own resources or those of our friends a gift, no matter how small, in token of our loving appreciation and remembrance of our promoted comrade? I am quite sure we shall respond with a hearty good will.

As president of the W. W. C. T. U., I will set the example herewith by subscribing twenty-five dollars to the Mary Allen West school of methods in Asheville, North Carolina, in token of love and good-will toward our white ribbon sisters in the South.

Please let all who will subscribe, send the money to that veteran in our ranks, Mrs. L. M. Pease, Asheville, North Carolina, or to Mrs. Mary C. Woody, Guilford College, North Carolina, the valiant president of the W. C. T. U. in that state.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL NOTES.

Miss S. Merrill, a member of the Clara Barton Training School class of '92, is now head nurse in the Baptist Hospital of this city. Miss Merrill thoroughly understands the care of the sick, and, more, she understands her work from a temperance standpoint. This is making practical a principle that pleads for the good of all.

The little eight year old girl who came to the hospital several weeks ago suffering from a severe attack of chorea has so much improved that her friends scarcely know her. She occupies Mrs. Hobbs' bed. "Little Emma," who occupies the Illinois state bed is also much improved. With her sunny face and cheerful ways she has won the hearts of all. "To know her is to love her."

The matron, Mrs. S. M. Hornby, begs leave to say that she has a number of empty jelly glasses and cans, and those desiring to donate fruit to the hospital can have the empty cans sent to them by sending order for the number required.

Miss Walker, of New York, while in the hospital was confirmed by Bishop Seymour, of the Episcopal church of this city. The services were beautiful and touched the hearts of all those present.

Among the patients at the hospital is a little one year old babe, left there by the mother who thus hopes to have her little one restored to health.

Looking at it from our standpoint we are glad to say that all of the furnished rooms at the hospital are occupied. Glad because we know that the sick and suffering will be cared for under principles that administer no alcohol in the treatment of disease; glad because so many friends believe so fully in the cause and the scientific principle contained therein, that they are willing to put their lives in the hands of the practical temperance doctor and the temperance nurse. Strange that custom should have made it otherwise, and that we are just awakening to the fact that alcohol is not needed in medicine. However, this is a practical age, and temperance is in the vanguard and is demonstrating to the satisfaction of the inquiring physician that alcoholic medication is not a necessity. Well I meant to say that all the furnished rooms are filled, and there are still unfurnished rooms to be fitted up. Who, out of the abundance with which he has been blessed, will assist in making ready for those who would like the care of the hospital, but cannot gain entrance?

We have the rooms but not the furniture. Besides unfurnished rooms, the ward has still space for five beds. Forty dollars will furnish a bed, and if the ward was furnished we could accommodate five more patients, and that means five more demonstrations of the principle of non-alcoholic medication.

Contributions received by the matron during March, 1893:

March: Unknown, 9 cans fruit, 4 glasses jelly, old papers and magazines; unknown, old books, 2 glasses jelly, 1 peck dried corn. Shelbyville, Ill., W. C. T. U., 15 cans fruit, 8 glasses jelly, 2 bottles of honey, 3 pounds of prunes, one-half pound tea, 3 pounds dried apples, 6 towels. Mrs. Young, 1 comfort, 4 cans fruit, 18 glasses jelly. ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MICHIGAN ITEMS.

The contract for the Michigan W. C. T. U. building at Hackley Park, near Muskegon, has been let. The work upon it will begin in two weeks, and the Hall and Home will be ready for the school of methods which opens July 27 with the Assembly. Our unions and friends in Michigan who are willing to help this enterprise are asked to send in their gifts at once, as they are now needed.

Hackley Park is a spot of uncommon natural beauty, and with the money invested in it, success is assured. The gift to the state W. C. T. U. of a fine site and one thousand dollars toward the building should move the white-ribboners of Michigan to build in a way worthy of themselves and their cause.

The Michigan state W. C. T. U. convention will be held at Muskegon, May 9 to 12, inclusive. The very best plans are being laid for the entertainment and pleasure of the delegates. By that time the Home and Hall at Hackley Park will be more than a plan on paper, and the convention will have a chance to see the reality.

A fine program is being prepared.

PETITION OF THE WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE HOME

Addressed to the Governments of the World.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

NAMES. | RESIDENCES.

Will not everybody who loves the great cause of home protection, send to Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Ravenna, O., for the regular form and circulate it to the best of her ability, sending the names to Alice E. Briggs, Evanston, Ill.?

TONY, THE ARISTOCRAT.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

(Concluded.)

In Hoodlum Alley great had been the wonder and mystery about the disappearance of Tony, the Aristocrat. The set of boys in the next street who had assaulted him became frightened at his non-appearance and kept silent as the grave. They were terrified at the possible results if their night's work should be discovered.

Tony's admirers were greatly mystified over the case. They had found some of his scattered papers near the board-pile and there was blood on one of them. That was their only clue and that was a weak one. It was hopeless to try to trace the affair out. He had not a relative in the world. Homeless, orphaned and alone in life, he had lived here and there in Hoodlum Alley, the most desolate and yet the cheeriest newsboy in the whole city. After awhile they gave it up as an unsoluble mystery, but they often spoke of Tony, the Aristocrat, in tones of respect and words of praise. He was not forgotten.

One day there was a sensation in Hoodlum Alley. Down its well-known street sauntered a familiar figure, familiar not by means of clothes, for the ragged overcoat and rakish cap were missing. But that snub-nosed, freckled face with its green-gray eyes was the same except that it was marvelously clean.

Immediately a cry arose. "Tony, the 'Ristercrat! It's Tony! It's Tony! Ain't yer dead, Tony? Where yer been, Tony?" And they crowded around him in true gamin style, hanging over each other's shoulders for a look at him, "downing" his shining new shoes in that ridiculous way all boys know about, hitting him with hearty familiarity upon the well-fitting back of his new coat, giving an inquiring twist to the new neck-tie and rolling their eyes at the glossy collar around his neck.

Multitudinous were the questions and comments addressed to the hero of the day as he stood, the center of his admiring audience and condescendingly explained to them the good luck that had come across his path, good-humoredly setting forth his experiences for their amusement.

Tony, the Aristocrat, was not above going from house to house for a hand-shake and a word with all the neighbors. The boys escorted him about and looked on in delighted approval. His good fortune had not made him feel above his former friends.

When he turned at last to go, a howl arose.

"Yer ain't goin', Tony! Hi, Tony, hain't yer come back fer good? Ain't yer goin' ter sell papers no more, Tony?"

Tony had not yet told them that he was the doctor's office-boy. When he told them they let him go, bidding him "come ag'in an' never forgit the kids!"

The boys in the next street had been envious witnesses of the open-air reception, and all the glories and honors attending the triumphant return of Tony, the Aristocrat. They were as jealous and as humiliated at the result of their attack as even Tony himself could have desired.

Civilization agreed with Tony. By slow degrees his uncouth manners dropped off, influenced in part by the sweet, natural grace of Edith Servisse, and in part by the true, honest, unpretentious gentlemanliness of the doctor himself. He broke off his cigarette habit, seeing the undisguised disgust in Edith's blue eyes one day when she surprised him enjoying a smoke. It was wonderful how the dainty little lady came to be the ruler of his life and habits—how every barbaric trait of his gradually gave way before her gentle refinement. It was wonderful how the silent influence of good clothes, good food, and warmth and shelter transformed the street Arab into a brisk, bright, alert boy, active and stirring and eager to help in a hundred different ways.

He was very useful to the doctor's wife. It was Tony who was entrusted with the escort of her little daughter when she went to parties and matinees. It was Tony who ran willingly upon her errands to the ladies of the church societies, Tony who was always ready to do her bidding in a certain condescending kind of way which was as natural to him as his green-gray eyes or his snub nose. It was impossible for Tony to appear humble. It could not be. He might feel humility but he could not show it. There was no unpleasantness in that condescension of his because it was so simply natural.

One night, when Tony had been the doctor's office-boy a year, fire broke out in the second story of the doctor's house. It was late when Tony discovered it—too late to save anything. In an incredibly short time, it seemed to him, the house was filled with smoke and hot, stifling air while flames crept and ran here and there catching at this and that to devour.

The doctor was away from home. He had been called out in the early part of the night and Tony had been sleeping in the office when the smell of smoke aroused him. He alarmed the two servants who hastily seized their few treasures and ran out of the house. Up the stairs Tony ran, scarcely seeing where he was going because of the blinding smoke. Into room after room in search of Edith the boy stumbled on, groping here and there with outstretched hands and face ashy white.

He called her name, "Edith—Edith!" but there was no response. He grew half-wild with fear. At last he found her in her little white bed sleeping heavily. He seized her in his arms and ran with her as well as he could, his thin, wiry little frame staggering under the dead weight of the child's plump body.

When he reached the street he gave her into the arms of one of the terrified servants standing distractedly about, too frightened to give an alarm—then ran again into the blazing building. He must arouse the doctor's wife! He must save her! What would the doctor say if he returned and found—

He found her, half suffocated by the smoke and unconscious. He called to her, shook her, seized her inert, drooping hand and tried to arouse her but it was of no use—he must carry her himself—there was no one else to do it. He shrank from this new strain. Already his whole frame trembled like a wind-shaken bough and he felt weak and exhausted. But it must be done. He saw it was useless to waste the precious time trying to arouse her, he must take her as she was.

He pulled her from the bed and seizing her two wrists in his firm grasp, drew her into the passage and stopped a moment to get his breath. She was a tall woman and largely built. It was a terrible exertion for the boy How it was accomplished no one ever knew, but at last he staggered through the door, half dragging, half carrying the insensible form and fell upon the door-step in the very moment of his triumph—dead.

It was a pitiful, bruised and broken little body over which the doctor and his little daughter bent tearfully the next day. The doctor uncovered the poor brave hands and kissed them tenderly, and Edith kissed them too.

"He saved your mother's life, Edith—always remember that!" he said between his sobs.

"Mine too, papa," Edith said softly; "he saved mine too."

"Yes, darling," he answered gently, "dear little Tony!"

One of the city reporters got hold of the affair and wrote it up for the papers. With a city reporter's indefatigable zeal and patience, he sought out the boy's history—as much as could be known—interviewed the doctor and visited Hoodlum Alley in search of information. It was a well-written article, dramatic in its intensity and illustrated with a cut of Tony, the Aristocrat.

The boys in Hoodlum Alley for years carried about in their dirty pockets the precious scraps and clippings they had cut from the papers concerning their favorite. He was for evermore raised in their loving hearts to the highest ranks of heroism, and the half-civilized ragamuffins worshiped his memory. Surely it is a noble thing to leave behind a memory like this.

Tony was laid to rest in the doctor's own handsome lot in beautiful Greenwood cemetery. The boys of Hoodlum Alley sent a committee to beg the doctor to let them buy the headstone. The doctor was touched by their simple earnestness and loyalty to their dead friend.

"Tony wa'n't never too good fer us kids," they said. "He wa'n't never above them as used to be his chums. He come to see us, he did—Tony did. We want to chip in an' buy him a stone an' have this onto it—'Tony, the 'Ristercrat,' 'cause that's what we allers called him. That's all we want onto it. We don't know how old he was nor what his hull name was,—no more did he,—so 'Tony, the 'Ristercrat's' 'nough."

Pennies, nickels, dimes and quarters, patiently hoarded by the newsboys and bootblacks in Hoodlum Alley, bought at last a simple white marble slab. The boys in the next street,—the boys who had been his enemies,—came with their small offerings and wanted to help too. Such heroism as he had shown could not but appeal to the noblest that was in their natures, such self-sacrifice as that could not but wipe the hatred and envy and jealousy from their hearts and make them better, nobler, truer boys than they had been before.

To-day, with Edith Servisse, now a sweet-faced girl in the early bloom of maidenhood, I visited that little grave. It was covered with flowers and looked bright and cheery. Somehow it reminded me of the boy as he used to look with a buttonhole bouquet pinned to his ragged overcoat,

But all that is past now. Edith and I believe that Tony, the Aristocrat, is happy to-day in a lovelier home than any on this earth and that the nameless waif has entered that grand and glorious Aristocracy which belongs to the children of the Heavenly King.

Santa Paula, Cal.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—The following rhymes come from a delightful "cozy corner" in a prohibition home, where the children are much interested in temperance. They have sent them for the entertainment of the big UNION SIGNAL temperance family:

JUDGE PROHIBITION'S SENTENCE.

The temperance navy's brave lads in blue
Went out to battle the whole liquor crew.
They captured them all,
Both great ones and small,
And brought them for sentence when through.

Now fetch me the prisoners, binding them fast,
And blow on the trumpet a loud, ringing blast,
These captives must sup
From dark poison's cup,
For righteousness now is triumphant at last.

Pluck the laurel from that brow;
"Fine old wine," no longer now
Kings and princes to you bow.
"Dandy brandy" and "bum rum,"
Reckoning for you has come.
"Frisky whisky," you must go
To the deepest shades below.
"Pale ale," the day is won,
Henceforth you all men will shun.
Here, beer, you, too, must skip,
Cold water rules aboard this ship!
Derider, cider, cease to fight,
What's partly wrong can ne'er be right.
Oh, wicked gin, not all your kin
Can save you from the home of sin.
Punch, your lunch will now consist
Of tears and groans, a grewsome grist.

Now, taking the convicts and chaining them tight
Throw them right overboard, way out of sight.
Saved souls is the gain
When alcohol's slain,
And this you can do if you work with your might.

Lillie, Penn. "EFFIE EMSIE."

We all thank this temperance family for remembering our Cozy Corner, and are glad to number them among us.

Our Library Table.

The April number of LIPPINCOTT'S contains the second of "Lippincott's Notable Stories," a series published monthly on a competitive plan. The story is entitled "Abraham's Mother," and can most emphatically lay claim to the merit of high originality. The novelette of this issue is a seasonable one, "Columbus in Love," by George Alfred Townsend. Julian Hawthorne falls into line with "A Description of the Inexpressible," i. e., a description of the World's Fair, and Frederic M. Bird contributes a brief but pithy article on "The Religion of 1492."

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia.

Very widely known is Tello d' Apery, the boy editor and publisher of THE SUNNY HOUR. The April number of this earnest and wide-awake little magazine contains an editorial account of "The opening of the William F. Miller Library" in the SUNNY HOUR building. "All that the boys have to do is to have clean faces and hands, and behave, and they are welcome to come and make friends with these delightful books." Arrangements are to be made for the admission of girls also—a very wise thought. Tello d' Apery, who has been too busy in helping his little barefoot friends to take care of his own health, is forced to go abroad for rest and change. He leaves Jack Bristol to fill the editorial chair and wield the editorial pen, which the young gentleman does well, as all will agree who read the editorial pages of this month.

59 W. 24th street, New York City.

The ARENA, which gives itself to the fearless discussion of those perplexing social problems which at times present a threatening mien to the peace and safety of our country, embraces in its April issue a fine article by Alfred Russel Wallace, D. C. L., entitled "The Social Quagmire and the Way Out." It is the second in the series of papers on wage-workers, and should be widely quoted by the press. A few sentences given right here will be the best presentation the article can possibly have: "After a century of unprecedented growth and the utilization of the natural riches of a great continent, we find to-day in all the great cities of the United States thousands and tens of thousands who, by constant toil, cannot secure necessaries and comforts for their children or make any provision for an old age of peaceful repose. One great object of republican institutions has, it is clear, not been attained. . . . . Let it be clearly understood that I do not in any way imply that republicanism is itself the cause of this state of things. It simply exists in spite of republicanism . . . . is common alike to republic, constitutional monarchy and despotism, and we are thus taught where not to look for the remedy. . . . . The one thing that it always accompanies is CAPITALISM. . . . Great wealth is obtained by individuals in two ways, either by speculation, which is but a form of gambling, and perhaps the very worst form, since it impoverishes not a few fellow gamblers only, but the whole community; or by large industrial enterprises, and these depend for their success on the existence of great bodies of laborers, who have no means of living except by wage labor, and are thus absolutely dependent on employment by capitalists in order to sustain life, and are compelled in the last resort to accept such wages as the capitalists choose to give." In the same plain, logical manner the author goes to the root of the difficulty, discussing the land question, the difference between the actual profits made respectively by the small land owners in cultivation and the profits made by large farmers, and in turn those accruing to the land owners leasing these farms for heavy rents. The article closes: "The system which permits and even encourages land monopoly and land speculation inevitably brings about another form of slavery, more far-reaching, more terrible in its results than the chattel slavery you have abolished. . . . . This system needs no gigantic war to overthrow it; it can be destroyed without really injuring a single human being. Only you must not waste your time and strength in the advocacy of half-measures and petty palliatives, which will leave the system itself to produce ever a fresh crop of evil. The voice of the working and suffering millions must give out no uncertain sound, but must declare unmistakably to those who claim to represent them: "Our land system is the fundamental cause of the persistent misery and poverty of the workers; root and branch it is wholly evil; its fruits are deadly poison; cut it down. Why cumbereth it the ground?"

CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

Write to John J. Byrne, Asst. Passenger Traffic Manager, 723 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., if you are interested in California, and he will send you some reading matter.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

will be visited by millions of people; the all absorbing question is, where will the people stop? Ample provisions are being made to care for all; with the visitor it is a question of selection, for many choice places in choice locations are offered. The offer made on our first page this week by the World's Fair Temperance Encampment is well worth your attention. We have personally investigated this encampment and find it is all they claim for it; we are personally acquainted with the gentlemen interested and regard them as honorable, upright Christian men.

CONOVER PIANO.

Too much cannot be said in praise of the Conover Piano. Although a new and not widely-known instrument, it possesses most excellent qualities. Its beauty, power and purity of tone is a revelation and have been greatly praised by most able artists. Its construction includes numerous valuable patents; it possesses sweet singing qualities, great volume of sound, brilliancy and clear, ringing tones like the sweetest of bells. This piano is fitted with a new dulcet middle pedal, enabling the performer to produce the most charming and delicate effects possible. The combination of this and the loud pedal, with an elastic, crisp touch, makes very clear, soft Æolian-like music. The Conover is made in various styles, both in uprights and grands, by the very reliable and enterprising Chicago Cottage Organ Company, 215 Wabash Ave.

Hull, is a wonder-tale filled with all the romance and truth of the great event of America's discovery, and told for young readers in a pure yet thrilling manner. There is already a large demand for this unique child's history among parents and teachers who desire to answer authentically all questions and controversies which come to the ears of children. Columbus will be always with us as much a feature in the future as Washington, being the step beyond Washington and the home-nation into the great mother, Europe, and the beginnings of the child Columbia. OUR MESSAGE.

Our Message, the official organ of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U., in its February issue makes an earnest appeal for THE UNION SIGNAL and its own paper, "not to find fault with what any union is doing for these publications, but rather to stir up your minds by way of remembrance that one and all may attempt greater things for them."

To facilitate this work, Mrs. M. E. Cheney, who is the author of the article makes the following pertinent suggestions:

First. The appointment in each union of some active, wide-awake woman to look after the interests of the papers. In small unions it might be well to combine this department with that of literature, as they are in a measure akin.

Second. That the superintendent be provided with and be a reader of these papers, so she can intelligently press their claims.

Third. That she, or some person whom she may select, attend all meetings of the local union in order that these papers be constantly brought to the notice of those present.

Fourth. Use every means possible to increase the circulation of THE UNION SIGNAL outside the ranks of the W. C. T. U. This can be furthered by securing trial subscriptions, sending out sample copies, etc.

Fifth. Endeavor to reach the stay-at-homes with an invitation to subscribe for both papers.

Sixth. Let the superintendent keep a correct list of all subscriptions received, so as to notify subscribers when to renew.

The Bering sea court of arbitration is still in session at Paris.

Carpenters at the World's Fair are on the verge of a strike.

The anniversary of Grecian independence was celebrated in Athens, April 13.

At the school elections held in Illinois last Saturday, women were chosen for directors in several districts.

A total eclipse of the sun, visible to the southern hemisphere, was observed April 16 by astronomers, at various stations.

King Humbert and his retinue paid a visit to Queen Victoria, at Villa Palmieri, near Florence, Italy, last Thursday.

The state temperance meeting at Huron, South Dak., closed April 14, after formulating plans for a vigorous summer campaign to enforce the state prohibitory law.

Seventeen foreign men-of-war are in harbor at Hampton Roads, Virginia, to participate in the international naval review, planned by the United States government.

The governors of thirteen of the southern states met in convention at Richmond, Va., April 13, to consider measures for the advancement of the industrial interests of their states.

The crown prince of Servia, seventeen years of age, seized the throne, April 14, and proclaimed himself King Alexander I. He will probably recall his mother, the banished Queen Natalie. The populace approves the young king's act.

Belgian workingmen are on a general strike, caused by the rejection of the universal suffrage bill, by the Chamber of Deputies. On Saturday the riotous disturbances in Brussels were so great that the streets were deserted by all save the rioters and the police.

A dispatch from San Francisco, April 13, announces that the American protectorate over the Hawaiian Islands has been dissolved by order of Commissioner Blount, the Hawaiian flag being returned to its place and the United States marines ordered back to their boats.

The report of the Minnesota senate investigating committee, April 13, in regard to the extortions of the coal trust in that state, testifies to the existence of a harmful combination among the shippers and wholesale dealers in coal, detrimental to the interests of the state and the welfare of the people.

THE fourth biennial convention of the Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States and British Provinces meets at Toledo, Ohio, April 27-30. This International Association includes three hundred city and college Young Women's Christian Associations in thirty-seven states and provinces. There are sixteen state organizations holding annual conventions, most of them employing state secretaries. The headquarters of the International Association are in Chicago.

IT will be remembered that the suggestion for Miss Willard's bust, described in another paragraph, was made by Mrs. Carse at the Boston Convention, and Lady Henry Somerset was the first contributor, giving generously one-half of the supposed cost. Since then the expenses have been somewhat increased, and several contributions made at that time have not been paid in, owing, doubtless, to the uncertainty as to when they would be required. If all such friends and others who would like to have an ownership in this wonderful portrait bust of our cherished chieftain would send gifts, large or small, to Mrs. M. B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, they will be thankfully received and promptly acknowledged. The bust will occupy a prominent position in the Woman's Building, at the Columbian Exposition this summer, and afterwards be given appropriate place in Willard Hall, of the Temple.

THE first World's Sunday-school convention ever held in America, will convene in St. Louis, Mo., September 4–6, at the close of the international gathering of Sunday-school workers. The number of delegates from America will be limited to four times the representation in Congress, or one delegate to thirty-seven thousand, five hundred of the population. The delegation from foreign lands is unlimited, but restricted to such as bear credentials from national Sunday-school organizations, and to well-known Christian workers and missionaries. Entertainment will be furnished all delegates.

WE have received a private circular of the Columbia Casino company, which will operate on the grounds of the Columbian Exposition, the only building to be used exclusively as a restaurant. It is situated at the entrance from the pier, where all boat passengers will be obliged to either pass through it or along the side of it. Estimates are made for forty thousand meals a day at one dollar per meal, or forty thousand dollars and for "extras,—wine, beer and cigars," ten thousand dollars. Does this look like a safe place for young men to dine? An interesting fact in connection with this company is that one of its directors is a well-known Chicago brewer.

SOME of our clientelle want to know why Miss Willard's Catskill cottage is called "Eagle's Nest," Miss Lathbury explains thus: "On page 41 of 'Glimpses of Fifty Years' is the following: 'I had a seat in the tall black oak near the front gate, where I could read and write quite hidden from view. I had a box with lid and hinges fastened beside me, where I kept my sketches, and books, whence the "general public" was warned off by the words painted in large, black letters on a board nailed to the tree below: "THE EAGLE'S NEST, BEWARE!" Mary had her own smaller tree, near by, similarly fitted up.'" Our generous New York comrades very tenderly thus bind the early and the later life of the "Chieftain" in the name of the mountain eyrie.

BISHOP JOHN H. VINCENT, than whom none is better known in religious and literary circles, has the following to say of our far-reaching organization and ts leader in a recent letter: "I am a hearty believer in the W. C. T. U. I do not indorse every move it has made nor everything said by all of its representatives, but there are spots on the sun. Possibly where I differ from some of the leaders of the W. C. T. U., they are right and I am wrong. As for the work as a whole accomplished by the union, it is beyond praise. I believe in it and advocate it. As for its president, Miss Willard, I regard her as the best illustration of the famous thirteenth chapter of Paul's first letter to the Corinthians I ever knew. I am a total abstainer and a Prohibitionist, and have been both for years." We are glad to publish the above from this noted leader and Christian worker, because honest praise from such a source has its attendant inspiration.

MR. EDWIN H. STOUT, associate editor with Lady Henry Somerset, of the Woman's Herald, has just brought out a valuable brochure containing a characteristic biographical sketch of Mr. W. T. Stead, with letters and essays on journalism. To any one intending to follow that profession this book will be of incalculable value, as it is written in the "off-hand," incisive style for which Mr. Stead has become famous, and is full of practical hints and helps. Mr. Stead believes the mission of the journalist to be unequaled in these days of rapid transit, and we think he makes out a remarkably good case. Mr. Stout's characterisms are of exceptional value from his sympathetic record with Mr. Stead and his close connection with him for the last seven years. He truly says that "while some men only write to live, Mr. Stead lives to write." He is the modern Sir Galahad, whose broad sword is the pen, whose holy grail is the sacrament of humanity's release from superstition, tradition and artificial bondage of every kind and class.

IT sounded whimsical enough to hear a leading member of Parliament say from his place in that famous assembly that "it is not a law against the liquor traffic but free education which will save us from drink." We in America have had free education for a couple of centuries, but the tide of drink has steadily increased. It is easy to make a fetish of education or of any other line of progress. Our white-ribboners tell us that in South Africa, among the Boers in the Transvaal, they make a fetish of the Bible, insisting with great vehemence upon their orthodoxy, but they wallow in drink and are amongst the most immoral white people that can be found. God has not left Himself without a witness, and in vain do we seek to mollify the wrath of nature's broken law by incantations and prayers based on the lie of a false life.

RARELY has THE UNION SIGNAL force realized a happier time than last Saturday morning, when the box containing the marble bust of Miss Frances E. Willard was unpacked. We gathered around it in gleeful expectation, for the Boston papers had already characterized it "one of the most interesting works in modern sculpture and an admirable likeness." We were not disappointed. As the beautiful marble portrait was carefully lifted from the box and placed on a temporary pedestal, every voice exclaimed, "Miss Willard!" The likeness was perfectly completed when a pair of eye-glasses were placed upon the nose. Miss Anne Whitney, the sculptress, has immortalized herself as well as Miss Willard in this work. It is a creation worthy to live forever. Says Miss Lillian Whiting, of Boston, "As one studies the countenance he feels that inscrutable expression that so preëminently characterizes Miss Willard in her highest moments. It is the reflection of spiritualization of thought, of a certain uplifting of feeling, and yet blended with it (so delicately that words are coarse to describe it) is a certain sagacity and definiteness of purpose. It is, indeed, as if she were receiving light from heaven, not to absorb it into her own soul, not merely as an experience of spiritual ecstacy, but to relate it to very present and practical needs. The expression thus caught and chiseled by Miss Whitney, is a very remarkable physcological effect in sculpture. It defies analysis and still more does it defy description."

IT will hardly be believed that the chief electrician of the London post-office has recently conveyed a message by electricity from Cardiff to a little island three miles off in the Bristol Channel, without the intervention of a wire. What he did was to put a long wire on the shore and a shorter one on the island, fitting the latter wire with a "sounder" to receive the message, and sending the message by a powerful telephonic generator. That message from the mainland was distinctly heard on the island. The message did not travel through earth or water or even air, but was transmitted through ether by means of waves of a certain and probably unusual magnitude; or to put it differently, as the London Spectator says: "It flew through a medium independent not only of human volition or energy, but of this planet, the medium which fills, so far as we know, all space, the medium through which light reaches us from the star Sirius." The principle being established, it is quite possible that if we had a generator strong enough we could send a wave of electricity to the planet Mars, where if a "sounder" was ready and human beings were there to hear, it would be audible; or to come nearer home, if we cannot some day communicate by telephone through the ether to New York or Melbourne without cables, the fault will be with our generators and sounders, for there is no natural law against it. Who shall say that beings may not exist who can in thinking a thought make that thought audible to finer ears than ours? The only person in these days likely to make mistakes is the one who says that this or anything else is impossible, for it seems as if we have come to the period when it is the impossible that happens.

REMEMBER—AND FORGET.

BY HARRIET NEWELL SWANWICK.

FIRST VOICE.

Oh! for a potent charm—a spell
To throw across the years;
Hiding the scars life's thorns have made
The furrows plowed by tears.

What Alchemist can separate
The bitter from the sweet;
In Lethe's stream sink pain and loss,
Leaving our joys complete?

SECOND VOICE.

Love only hath the power to break
The chain of memory;
And from it drop each baser link,
The golden hold for aye.

Then seek for this divinest gift
Nor cherish vain regret;
Both rose and thorn by One were sent,—
Remember and forget.

TRIUMVIRI.

Woman Suffrage.

BY O. B. BIRD, M. D.

[The Triumviri are three young men, former school and college mates, a doctor, a lawyer and a clergyman, who spent a vacation in the summer of 1891, without their wives and children, camping in the Adirondacs, after ten years of work in their several professions. Their situation will account for their freedom of speech. They called each other Doc, Judge and Dominie. Previous numbers June 30, 1892, and January 19, 1893.]

JUDGE.—Doc, do you believe in woman's rights?

DOCTOR.—Of course I do. I believe in everybody's rights and nobody's wrongs.

JUDGE.—I mean, do you believe in having women vote?

DOCTOR.—My wife always votes when it is time for the boy to go to bed or for me to have a new coat.

JUDGE.—I think I can shape my question so you will not dodge. Do you wish to have the women of the United States exercise the elective franchise on equal terms with the men of the United States?

DOCTOR.—I gather an inkling of your meaning; but as neither yes nor no will cover all my answer, I shall be obliged to specify a little.

JUDGE.—All right, your highness. There's an hour before bedtime. Proceed.

DOCTOR.—If matters were adjusted as they should be, so that party questions were always between right and wrong, and if there are as many men as women, then woman's vote would not change the result, because they would vote with their husbands.

JUDGE.—Yes; and if there were no sin and sickness in the world, there would be no need for such creatures as you and Dominie.

DOCTOR.—Precisely; but since both do exist, we are endured as antidotes. And my attitude as to a number of things that women do is somewhat similar.

JUDGE.—Endure them, eh, just as we do you and Dominie?

DOCTOR.—I spoke of the things that women do, not the women themselves. Theoretically, a woman should be the queen of a home, the mother and trainer of children for lives of usefulness, the ever-loved and loving better-half of the family, the—

JUDGE.—My wife to a T! But go on.

DOCTOR.—Theoretically, a man should be the strong half, carrying the others in his arms, as it were, providing for their needs and giving manliness for womanliness.

JUDGE.—That must mean—but modesty forbids. Next.

DOCTOR.—Neither is complete without the other. No question of superiority or rights should ever arise, since their interests are identical. Thus the theoretical unit in a theoretically perfect state of affairs would be the family, not the individual.

JUDGE.—Doc, are you building on your own experience?

DOCTOR.—Yes, my wife and I stand together on all important questions. This Utopian theory might be realized but for the existence of some form of evil in the world. Husbands and wives do not always agree, and since there is but one right side to any question, it follows that one of them is wrong. And then there are unmarried men and women who do not think alike, either. In short, somebody is in the wrong; and the question is, Who is right, and how shall the others be set right?

JUDGE.—Ask Dominie. He is trying to set people right.

DOMINIE.—Yes, but how long do you suppose I should hold my present position if I tried to influence votes?

DOCTOR.—Not long; for in politics and religion the other fellow is always wrong. I actually believe I should receive less annoyance, not to say open persecution among avowed infidels than I do in what was my own church, for daring to think for myself and trying to be reasonable.

JUDGE.—Ought to have kept your thoughts to yourself. But how about this voting business?

DOCTOR.—If all men and women were agreed as to questions requiring votes, there would be no need for women to vote, and I should not—

JUDGE.—Well, stop theory, and come down to facts.

DOCTOR.—Just what I am coming to. Is scientific temperance instruction a good thing?

JUDGE.—How big is it?

DOCTOR.—In nearly every state there is a law requiring that all pupils learn the general effects of alcohol and narcotics.

JUDGE.—A good thing, yes, the best in the century.

DOCTOR.—Whose work is it?

JUDGE.—The work of legislatures, of course. You said state law, didn't you?

DOCTOR.—Yes, but who influenced the legislators to pass such laws?

JUDGE.—You tell.

DOCTOR.—The women of the W. C. T. U.

JUDGE.—Did they vote?

DOCTOR.—No, but they did far more than vote. They labored with the men to an extent not dreamed of outside their circles. Even yet a few states have resisted them. They do ten thousand times more work than it would be to vote, and often for ten thousand times smaller results.

JUDGE.—I see the drift of your reasoning.

DOCTOR.—Who put the white shield of law around our girls, saving the ten-year-old babies from human beasts, and giving them fourteen, sixteen or eighteen years of safety? Who are trying now to snatch Delaware's seven-year-old girls from merciless designers and give them a taste of the protection to which they are entitled?

JUDGE.—Heavens! Doctor, do you know what figures you are using? Why, my Mabel is eight years old, and can it be that she—strange I never examined these laws!

DOCTOR.—Yes, and if you lived in Delaware you could have no legal redress. Those who abused Stead for turning England upside down soon found cause to blush for themselves.

JUDGE.—What were you saying about the women?

DOCTOR.—That they secured new laws by visiting legislatures, interviewing legislators, canvassing whole counties and states, and otherwise doing mountains of work compared with which voting would be mere atoms.

JUDGE.—And doing it for the men themselves, at that.

DOCTOR.—Certainly, pleading with men to come out of the rapids before they are drawn over the falls.

JUDGE.—Are the men duly grateful?

DOCTOR.—Most of those who pass the laws are. The others as a rule are not.

JUDGE.—Of course. Now, what next have the women done?

DOCTOR.—Too many things to specify. I mentioned these two as illustrations. The point I want to make is that women are already doing work that is open to every objection that can be urged against voting and many more; while men oppose until convinced and then yield, more or less gracefully and with varying majorities. The public applauds the women and welcomes the work and then shuts its eyes to the idea of other work still necessary, and says the women must not go into politics. It is as if they should let them work all day in a drenching rain and then pretend to shudder at the thought of seeing them step to the front gate in fair weather.

JUDGE.—I think you have answered the original question as to whether you favor woman suffrage.

DOCTOR.—Of course I favor it, but I am trying to show you the reason for my attitude, or rather my attitude itself, for I have not done that yet.

JUDGE.—Sail on, Doc. My ears are open.

DOCTOR.—Well, there's a tremendous amount of wrong in the world.

JUDGE.—Granted; your hat is wrong side before.

DOCTOR.—Hang it on that bush. The wrongs I have just mentioned were not righted until the women took them up. And it is but a short step to the idea that there are other wrongs in the same condition. The women have helped us out in a number of cases; and it would be but right to ask them if they see any other blots on our escutcheons.

JUDGE.—Dominie, would that be a safe experiment?

DOMINIE.—Not with a majority of the men I know; but I believe Doc is on the right track, whatever he is coming to.

JUDGE.—Easy to see his drift. He is coming to his favorite theme, liquor business.

DOCTOR.—Yes, and lotteries and bad pictures and low theaters, and unorganized charity and corners on sugar and coal and grain, and voting for our highest officers by foreign scum and illiterate criminals, and any other form of evil that shows its head. My attitude is simply this: Just as men alone could not get out of the slums mentioned, men alone cannot get out of the chains of the liquor power; and just as the women put us on our feet in those cases, so the women can help us out of the gutter and give us temperance. In other words, men are helpless and the women can help them. But as history repeats itself, the men refuse help, and will continue to refuse until the women do a million times more work than voting. Instead of this we ought to welcome them as angels of light, to save us from ourselves, and to look upon their voting as the greatest possible favor to us.

JUDGE.—You seem to put it on the ground of necessity rather than right.

DOCTOR.—Because it is of first importance. I acknowledge the right, however, but think that part of the question is swallowed up in the other.

JUDGE.—And so you think men ought to be willing to let women vote, if the women are willing to waive the question of right, and do it from motives of philanthropic expediency.

DOCTOR.—Yes, assuredly; but I believe the public acknowledgment of the legal right would immediately follow the fact, however that came about.

JUDGE.—Dominie, aren't you glad you never opposed woman suffrage?

DOMINIE.—Change line five, page four, so as to read: Should be glad if I never had opposed woman suffrage.

DOCTOR.—Judge, give us the old college song about Mary's lamb.

JUDGE.—Which one, and what words?

DOCTOR.—Number three with improvised words. I'll give the first verse:

Fair Mary's lamb, it ate a clam,
And set the people thinking;
Then turned a goat and with a vote,
Soon stopped all liquor drinking.

REFORMERS.

Plain Truths, with Crumbs of Comfort and Advice for Them.

BY REV. HENRY A. DELANO, D. D.

The world needs every man and woman in order to save it. Every blessed soul in whom the Christly spirit is incarnate gives an upward push or pull to everything around him. Altruism—that heaven-born spirit that cares for one other, or many others—unselfishly finds its life one long, hard lift and tug at the indifferent and inert mass surrounding it.

Cold, pessimistic philosophy meets the spirit of reform, however, with the old oft-recurrent cry: "I don't believe in you; there is no such thing as disinterested affection in this world, never has been." And this, despite the fact that since the death on Calvary's tree, probably not less than fifty millions of earnest hearts in battle, by martyrdom, and otherwise, have died to make men free, life better and love more real. Fifty millions, who "loved not their own lives even unto death."

If men called the Master, Jesus of Nazareth, who heads this glorious company, a "devil," is it a wonder or surprise that they should still echo such diatribe in the face of all deliverers, emancipators, evangels? The dog, maddened by pain, in the trap that has caught his paw, will often turn and bite the friendly hand that ventures to release him. It is the world's old way.

But the strong seem destined to carry, not only their own burdens, but the burdens of the weak. Chivalry must not only bear its rescued ones, but take along for a time all their doubtful impedimenta. "Whoso touches the leper runs his risk." "He who tries to repair an old gun may find it loaded, to his harm." No wonder the reformer is misunderstood. His ideal is far removed and remote from the average. The mighty thunder of the rhythmic, uniform march of the selfish millions, in quest of pleasure and search for gold, drowns ever the lighter footfalls of those who follow as the good angels of the camp. The deafening roar of the multitude and mob, "appeals to Cæsar," the cry of "important issue," the "tax," the "duties upon 'sugar,' 'tea,' 'twine'" blending harmoniously with "me and mine," the plea for "national honor" in dealing with a war question, all these make faint and scarce audible the "voice of one crying in the wilderness."

No loneliness, then, is more lonely, no separation more absolute, no tears more hot and bitter than experienced in the lot of those who would change the world's destiny, heal its sores and quiet its pain. Nothing in God Almighty's world is more disagreeable to a generous, large-souled man or woman than the task of upbraiding the world's phariseeism, pointing out its defects, or sometimes scourging its money-changers from holy temples where they have no rightful place. And yet, however high his instincts, however pure, æsthetic, or spiritual even, the aspirations of woman, the culture of pulpit, the wisdom of the press and the virtue of the home must relate themselves in some way to the hard, uncongenial problems of the day. But not by compromise.

The reformer must bear one thing everlastingly in mind. He cannot lift a world full of selfishness, sensuous appetite, passion and indulgence higher than himself, until he gets a perch for the moral foot upon high rock, and far above the plain of the "tramping multitude." "Aloft on the throne of God are the principles which no majorities can defeat or overthrow." Sumner felt that, and Garrison, and Lovejoy, and Phillips. Hence, the groundling's taunt. "You are impracticable, you are disintegrating things, a fanatic, a fool, dreamer, crank."

'Tis sad enough to throw the strength of one's life against the drink curse and be compensated by being called "a wine-bibber." To be prudent and dainty even, amid the world's viands and luxuries and be called "a glutton." To keep close company with the rare fellowship of the saints, but have it said, "thou hast a devil." To spend one's years in trying to learn the exact truth, height, length, depth, and breadth, and be rewarded by this, only: "Much learning hath made thee mad." To try to preserve one's judgment and "philosophic heights of calm," yet to be accused, at last, of "sentimentality, ignorance, wilfulness, conceit" and selfish motive.

But universal lot this of all who in ages past have startled the slumbers of a selfish world, whose thunderbolts have cleared the deadly atmosphere, or whose shafts of red-hot truth have pierced and awakened the calloused consciences of men. Paul, Polycarp, Ignatius, Pothinius, Olympia Morata, Felicitas—apostles, martyrs, philosophers, explorers, bishops, old men, maidens, soldiers, those who "would do the thing and scorn the consequences,"—they are gone, but their shoes are here full of red hot coals and their wreaths "with thorns which drip of blood,"—and those who choose, may wear them now.

If vanity, avarice, intemperance and misrule are to feel again the flail of the saints' courage, the reformer's indignation and the hero's purpose, then somebody must accept the situation. All free thought, liberty of person and speech, protected privilege, the spread of intelligence, the rights of conscience, a thousand nameless, blood-bought blessings have come to us through the hardihood, patience, sacrifice of those rare, unique, sturdy souls who dared to think and act ahead of the times.

You may choose. Build thou some pleasant cot for thyself, guard thine own home, shelter and preserve thine own selfish ideal; and, it will not tax or task thee other than a day. But to build a cathedral, to press the aspiration of an age, the longings of a century, the prayers, the efforts, the intelligence, the hopes of an era, into some great Milan, or Temple, will cost, oh, how much of the best! It will be delayed too. The patronage of a visconte, Amadeo, was there, to complete the "octagon cupola," a Fiboldi to ornament and beautify, but it was completed.

Longer work, truer, involving the loftier effort and sacrifice of wider centuries and deeper, belongs to that divine cathedral which God is fashioning through human hands and prayers. Help, if you will, but keep this in mind, you must not enlist in reform work as a business. "The laborer is worthy" but this work will never pay in dollars and cents. The merely professional reformer? Society has not a place for him as large as the cavity of a lady's thimble.

Do not think, either, that the lame side of the Body Politic is ever cured by turning over in bed. "Behold, the axe is laid at the root of the tree." License may be "restriction," but never reform. Slavery, mormonism, mammonism, lust, the saloon, etc., are not things to be restricted in God's kingdom, but to be killed. All that religion can do inwardly, all that the state can do outwardly, must be done, not so much to mitigate, palliate, check as to kill utterly. Do not postpone. Work to relieve, educate, ripen and intensify public sentiment, to encourage the feeblest plants of reform, but work steadily to the one end, RE-FORM, out and out. "Behold, I make all things new." The "new heavens," however, can only smile in Apocalyptic splendor over the "new earth."

Evolutions are not down; they are forever upward, from less to greater. And this, because God, the greater, is beneath and in the less. We must go slow, patiently, lovingly, but go. Never mind misjudgment. The Samaritans refused Christ hospitality, "because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem." Never mind. The true reformer, heaven-sent and heaven-girded, is the wedge that will not out, until the huge rock of wrong is split in twain. The ghost, indeed, that will not down, so long as host and hostess at the nation's banquet have encrimsoned and unwashed hands—not until the Lamia of vice, intemperance and crime shrivels and shrinks and glides way, a loathsome serpent, to its native hell.

THE CONDITIONS OF SOLDIER LIFE IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

BY A UNITED STATES SOLDIER.

My attention was called a short time since to an article in your valuable paper on the subject of the post exchange in the United States Army. The system of recruiting for the army has undergone a great change in the last year or two, and, as a result, a better class of young men have, as a rule, been obtained, as evidenced not only by personal observation, but by the report of the Adjutant-general of the army.

Now, what do these young men find when they join the various organizations to which they are assigned? Open invitations to indulge in drinking, gambling, lewd and profane language. The article in your paper to which I have referred was mild in comparison with the description that could be given of the frightful state of affairs that does really exist. The old post-trader system is called everything that is bad by those in authority, and there is no doubt that it was a vile one; but so is the present one, in spite of the fatherly care bestowed upon it by the government, and the frantic efforts made by the War department, and others connected with them, to scatter false and misleading statements as to its nature. Why was the "canteen" changed recently to the "post-exchange"? If the truth be told, because the people were getting to know too much about the real state of affairs, and it was hoped that under the new name the matter would drop.

After every pay-day the men give themselves up to a drunken orgie, and nothing is thought of but drinking and gambling. And this is recognized by the officers as an established fact, nor is any effort made to check it. Why should there be? Is not the canteen distinctly sanctioned as a regular military institution; is it not superintended by an officer, who carefully estimates the requirements of the men so there shall be no fear of a failure in the supply; are not enlisted men detailed to attend to the bar, just as they are warned for guard; and do not the regulations state that all these details are to be looked on as a part of military duty? Further, do not the authorities invite the men to drink, bribing them with the statement that all the "profits" will be divided amongst the various organizations to help better the supply of food at their mess tables; and what is this but saying, "The more you drink the better you shall eat"?

Do all the recruits who have lately joined fall into these habits at once? No. A large proportion do not. Great care is taken, as the authorities state, in the enlistment of these young men, and a large number of them come from country districts, where home influences have been strong, where they have been taught to abhor the liquor traffic, and where all the bettering influences have had full sway.

Then why, it may be asked, all this outcry? If the authorities are getting better men into the army, these things that are so much complained of will shortly cease, and a much improved state of affairs come about as a natural consequence. Unfortunately, daily experience and personal contact with these men prove the contrary.

The Army and Navy Register of October 22 reports General Merritt as saying: "There is much complaint, however, among line officers, because of a lack of good material for non-commissioned officers. Many of the best men leave the army after a short service, under recent regulations"; and many other officers have reported the same thing in different phraseology. This is actually the case. The better material, on which the heads of the army are congratulating themselves as joining the same in large numbers. will not remain in it. Men are thoroughly sickened at the sights they see and the filthy language they hear, and, as a result, purchase their discharge under recent regulations, or take advantage of the "three years' act" to claim their discharge. And this is causing the authorities alarm, as it well may. No more friendly act can be done the government than the pointing out the fact that as long as they go down on their knees to the old drunkards, and do all in their power to propitiate that class of men, so long will all the better and more self-respecting element decline to have anything to do with them.

It is bad enough to see drunkenness, but when it must be encountered as a part of everyday association, when a man must have daily intercourse with it, sleep with it, dwell with it in barracks, then is he justified in asking the public to judge whether the army that sanctions and encourages such a thing is a fit place for respectable young men?

It may be said by some: "Why not make a firm stand against such a state of things?" No one, unless he has proved it by actual experience, can imagine what the result would be. But it may be sufficient for the purpose to say that the very fact a man does not join with the drinkers is enough to set every one against him. He is told: "You are no good; such as you are not required in the army," and in truth he is made to feel very much "not at home" in it. The better and wiser plan, as things are, is to keep silent and aloof from it all, as far as may be, and patiently abide the time to purchase or claim discharge, and then shake the dust off one's feet, and thank God for liberty to lead a decent life.

But of this new element that is joining the army there are some who are weaker than others, some who are perhaps not altogether unwilling, now that they are under no restraint, to be called a "good fellow"; these are soon spotted by the older hands and introduced to the canteen. Drunkenness follows, trial by Summary Court, and a fine. Then see the new victim's "friends"(?) How they surround him and cheer him up, leading him as a first step towards the very canteen that has been the cause of his disgrace, and then, after he has had a drink, telling him that "drunkenness is no crime"; that now he "is a soldier." What can but follow? In the army one's hands are tied, and it is a very risky thing to appeal to the papers, but it is a duty, and furthermore, it behooves all who have the welfare of the country at heart to stir this matter.

The Army and Navy Register of November 5, 1892, contains the report of the Inspector General of the army, and he is quoted as saying: "The nlistment of younger and better men is a matter not only of feasibility, but of absolute necessity, if our army is to be placed and maintained upon a par in point of quality and material with the armies of the great powers of the world. The law allows us to accept boys of sixteen and train them as they should be, and each congressman could certainly name several bright boys from his district who would be glad to derive all the benefits a careful military training gives."

Now, parents and guardians of "bright boys" and "boys of sixteen," pause and consider well before you allow any of your own kin, or any of your young friends who come under these headings to so much as think of entering the army. Do all you can to discourage the idea, until the government is made to see the folly of its course in willfully and systematically catering to drunkards. If, with these warnings, you neglect your duty you will be held responsible for giving your boy over, body and soul, to a life of sin. Drunkenness, gambling, and debauchery, such are the leading features of the American army as it exists to-day.

WORLD'S CONGRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE WOMEN.

BY RACHEL FOSTER AVERY.

Secretary of Committee of World's Congress of Representative Women.

The unique feature of the coming World's Fair, that which chiefly distinguishes it from all its predecessors, is the arrangement for a series of congresses in which the moral and intellectual side of the world's progress may be set forth in conjunction with the exposition of its material advance.

Near the center of the city, conveniently close to the principal hotels, a beautiful building has been erected by the coöperation of the directory of the World's Fair, the city of Chicago and the Chicago Art Institute, for the express purpose of providing suitable quarters for these congresses, but which is also planned to remain as a permanent, memorial art palace for the city. This building, with an entrance on Michigan Avenue and Adams Street, comprises two large halls, each with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred, and twenty smaller halls, seating from two hundred to seven hundred each, which together furnish perfect appointments for the conduct of the various congresses and conferences to be convened between May 15 and November 1.

While in each of these more than one hundred congresses (devoted to the discussion of education, industry, art and literature, philanthropy and charity, moral and social reform, religion, science and philosophy, civil law and government) women will participate, according to the degree in which they have taken part in the interest or activity indicated by the title of the congress, one special congress has been arranged, to be called the World's Congress of Representative Women, in which these great subjects will be viewed from a different standpoint, its object being to discuss, not the subject in itself, but the relation of the women of the world to the subject.

With this object in view, invitations have been sent to every national association of women in the United States, Canada, England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Germany, Belgium, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Finland, and to individual women of eminence in Italy, Greece, Spain, Poland, Russia, China, Japan, South America, New Zealand, Austria, Holland, Turkey, Iceland, Mexico, Switzerland and India to send representatives to this special congress.

Two kinds of programs have been planned, one presenting the topics to be considered in a method calculated to interest general audiences, the other arranged with reference to specialists who wish to consider the same topics with greater detail than would be possible for large miscellaneous gatherings. The intention is to make this (which is the first of the series, opening May 15, and continuing one week) a memorial congress, and to have its papers and addresses chronicle what the congress itself will celebrate, namely, the progress of woman since the discovery of this continent in 1492. Each country represented in the congress is expected to send reports showing woman's advance in that country along the various lines above mentioned, setting forth her present educational opportunities, and the agencies through which these opportunities have been received, also the objects now sought in each country by its leaders.

Eight rooms in the Art Palace will be set aside for the use of the eight general departments into which the work of the congress is divided (one room being assigned to each department), and in these rooms will be conducted a constant series of special conferences of an informal character, which will enable women engaged in the same work to become acquainted with one another, and also with the various methods by which the work is prosecuted in different parts of the world.

In the other seven halls meetings of the various associations represented in the advisory council of the congress will be held, each association to have one day for its own special use, arranging its own program, providing its own speakers, and with its own officers presiding. Those who have already completed their preparations and requested the use of the hall are as follows: The Woman's National Indian Association, Association of Collegiate Alumnæ, American Society of Authors, Woman's Baptist Home Mission Society, General Federation of Women's Clubs, National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Woman's Republican Association of the United States, National Council of Women, Woman's Western Unitarian Conference, Columbian Housekeepers' Association, National American Woman Suffrage Association, Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Reformed Church in the United States, International Council of Women, Non-Partisan National Women's Christian Temperance Union, Young Ladies' National Mutual Improvement Association, Wimodaughsis, International Kindergarten Union, Woman's National Relief Corps, Daughters of the American Revolution, Order of the Eastern Star, Loyal Women of American Liberty, National Alliance of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women, International Young Woman's Christian Association, National Woman's Relief Society, National Christian League for the Promotion of Social Purity, Woman's Centenary Association of the Universalist Church and the Woman's National Alliance.

One hall will be used each day of the week for the especial purpose of hearing and discussing reports of organizations. Nine meetings may thus be in progress simultaneously, two in main halls and seven in the department halls, giving a wide variety of choice to the thousands who will assemble in Chicago during this most interesting week.

Monday will be devoted principally to the opening of the congress, the addresses of welcome, introduction of foreign delegates and their responses in behalf of their respective countries. Tuesday, the morning addresses in the large halls will be on the Civil and Social Evolution of Woman and the Administrative Ability of Woman; in the evening, on Woman, the New Factor in Economics, the Industrial Position of Woman in Germany and the Industrial Position of Woman in France; Wednesday, the Ethics of Dress, Woman on the Stage, the New Womanhood of Italy, Our Debt to Zurich and to Brussels, and Woman in the Pulpit; Thursday, Woman as a Financier, Women in Municipal Government, the Political Future of Woman; the Solidarity of Human Interests; Friday, Woman's War for Peace, Woman as a Social Leader, the Professions and Trades Underlying the Home, Woman in Science, Woman's Place in the Republic of Letters; Saturday, both sessions will be devoted to the presentation of the work of women in organizations, considered in respect to Religion, Philanthropy, Education, Moral Reform and Political Liberty, with a general discussion of the economy of woman's forces through organization. Sunday morning there will be a religious service, entirely conducted by women ordained as ministers, representing every denomination which has admitted women to the ministry, and the congress will close Sunday night with a sacred concert, with music composed, rendered and conducted by women, and a closing address on the Influence of the Columbian Exposition in Woman's Development.

Somerton, Pa.

CHRIST conquered everything which is adverse to the race, and His victory was its triumph. He uncovered the "image of God," which had been buried by traditional rubbish and sensuous materialism. . . . The great human campaign will not be ended until every member of the race has been translated into a "son of God." . . . "Sons of God" are those who are crucified in the lower self, and from the high altitude of their resurrection are able to draw men unto them.—Henry Wood.

REV. HUGH PRICE HUGHES ON THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

St. James' Hall, London, is a great popular resort for men and women of more than average opportunity and culture, who are drawn there by the polished eloquence of the Rev. Mark Guy Pearce, and the impetuous ardor and practical sagacity of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes. Morning, afternoon and evening services are held in this immense and admirably located hall at the West End. We have been there repeatedly, and some notes of things said and done may be of interest to readers of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The great choir, seated in a rising amphitheatre behind the speaker's stand, has in addition to the organ, men playing the big bass viol, women discoursing on gentle violins, and a clear-voiced precentor who leads the anthem and the congregational singing. Music is a prominent feature in all the services, and at the many meetings held on week days. In giving out these sociables and concerts, Mr. Hughes smilingly said: "Pray take advantage of these delightful opportunities to enjoy yourselves innocently."

Prince's Hall is a dependency of St. James' Hall, and on the evening that we spoke in the latter, which is the larger in reality, for the cause was being addressed by leading speakers at the former, Mr. Hugh Price Hughes gave a brief temperance sermon on the good Samaritan, of which we made the following notes:

"The universal instinct of mankind gave to this brotherly being whose name has not come down to us, the prefix, 'Good Samaritan.' The lawyer standing by to tempt, or more correctly, to test, though all temptations are really only tests, did good and not evil to his kind, because his question: 'Who is my neighbor?' brought from the lips of divine wisdom this pearl of parables. Tenderheartedness is the saving salt and vital element of all true goodness, and tenderness of heart will always instinctively find expression in a thousand friendly deeds.

"We all know that 'Thou shalt love,' was the sententious application of the parable. There are many tests of a Christian life, but there is one that under all skies remains the same. Without it you may have religiosity but you cannot have religion, and this test, as I have said, is tenderness of heart.

"The priest and Levite who passed by on the other side no doubt attended diligently morning and evening prayers in the great Temple. For seventeen centuries the church has largely forgotten that a compassionate heart is the one true sign of the imitation of Christ. The one need of London to-day is not money—there is plenty of that; not talent—we have it in sufficient measure; not Bibles, for any one can obtain them who will, but it is compassion. Judge Telford said: 'The great want of English society is sympathy.'

"There is such an ocean of misery in London while I am speaking to-night, for the single reason that men and women are walking about with hearts of stone in their breasts; could these but turn to hearts of flesh, in one year London would become the City of God. My friends, the devil rejoices in you if you have no heart. The heretic and schismatic with a heart is a thousand times dearer to God and man than the most orthodox church member without.

"The temperance reform is so great that all other reforms in comparison to it are not worth naming. So says the Speaker, edited by men who spend their time in London clubs. The government commissions have given us abundant evidence of the misery in the midst of which we dwell, and which is the outcome of the liquor traffic, but as we have not a superabundance of heart among us we go our way and forget all about this testimony. The Speaker says there are 600,000 drunkards in England. Three-fourths of the prisoners were pushed into their narrow cells with the hot hand of alcohol as the moving force behind them. If you were to make a procession across this stage in which the victims of the curse are passed before us in review, every debased woman in the land would come, for without liquor these women could not endure the horrors of their daily life. The curse is as great in Christian England to-day as was the last and greatest plague in Egypt, and I challenge any one in this great audience to rise and say: 'No friend or relation of mine has ever died of drink.' But these who die a death so dreary do not come from the ranks of the total abstainers. Where did they come from? Will you contribute your example to swell the total of their temptation? Will you act out the Golden Rule in your own city and your own century? Do not think your hymns and prayers amount to anything if you have not a compassionate heart.

"Now to return. The priest had five reasons why he should not help the poor fellow who had fallen among thieves. 'In the first place,' said the priest to himself, 'this is his own fault; if he had watched out as I had done, he never would have been assaulted. Why should I make this sacrifice and take the risk of danger? It would do him no good, he has fallen by the way, I cannot remove his wounds, they have been inflicted already and there they must stay. I am expected home by my wife and family, I have duties to them; besides I have set the right way before this man, if he had done as I did he never would have been in this unhappy case.'

"But while the priest had five reasons the Levite had a sixth; for he could say to himself: 'The priest did not stop, and yet he is an example to the flock. Who am I to imitate if not my superior? Shall I profess to be actuated by higher principles than my betters? Nay, this would ill become me.' And so these two men passed on to condemnation. But do not you think it will count to them at the great assize when they rehearse their diligence in church attendance and psalm singing? I tell you nay. The helpful deed they might have done, but did not do, shall rise up against them as a swift witness. Their own memories will be their Nemesis, and this is no more true of them than it will be of us who walk these London streets but do not play the part of the Good Samaritan to our brothers drowning in drink. We have tried all other ways to help. This one remains and for its fullest possibilities we are responsible to God and man."

Canon Leigh, a man of tender and benign presence, concerning whom some one whispered to me as he rose: "He is a member of the aristocracy" (whatever that may be), exhorted after the brief and pungent sermon of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes. He said: "It is the heavy mediocrity that blocks the way in all good work; their inertia and conservatism are like a boulder on the path of progress. Why is the audience smaller on temperance Sunday in our churches? Why is the collection less? It is the heavy mediocrity who stay at home before their pleasant firesides and let the temperance cause take care of itself." The Canon instanced John Howard, who began his work in 1773 and died in 1805, who declined to go to dinner with the Czar of Russia because he had an engagement to visit the dungeon of a convict, and William Wilberforce, who headed the movement that wrought out the freedom of the slave. These two men showed the government and people that the condition of things with respect to prisoners and slaves could not and should not be endured. Lord Shaftesbury was the great defender of the weak, both in and out of Parliament, and by his influence and vote helped beyond any other man of his generation to rescue the poor of every degree and class.

"Though oft depressed and lonely, all my fears are laid aside,
If I but remember only such as these have lived and died."

MISS ACKERMANN IN INDIA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I reached Calcutta on November 7, after a few days of rough sailing and all the misery one could experience on a stormy sea, ready to begin work on the following day. We commenced a mission on Sunday night in the M. E. church, which is the second largest church in the Southern Hemisphere; it was packed with an English-speaking audience.

Calcutta is a very hard place to work in, and some of the great speakers from England have completely failed in reaching the people; these meetings were considered well attended, continuing through the week in that church; women's drawing-room meetings and gatherings for the young people and the natives were held in the afternoon. A number of new workers joined the union. New officers and superintendents were elected, among them a superintendent for the press, who secured a column in one of the leading daily papers. A large number of natives signed the pledge to abstain from opium and strong drink and united with the I. O. G. T.

Calcutta is not in the least oriental in appearance, but a city of great beauty. The houses are large, with great pillars supporting heavy archways, the rooms lofty and well arranged, and most are surrounded by lovely gardens. The avenues and streets are very wide and well kept, and its fashionable drive about five o'clock in the afternoon is one of the sights of the city. The native city is densely populated, and the natives bathing in the Hoogly, burning their dead, sacrificing their goats and worshiping before their idols, fill one's heart with real sorrow.

I visited the birthplace of Thackeray and Carey's old church; stood in the pulpit where he preached a hundred years ago, and went down in the baptistry where Judson was baptized. Lingering around this spot of so much interest, recalling the life of that wonderful man, it seemed to me I received a new inspiration to go on in the Master's work.

Late one night I started for the "Holy City of the Hindus," Benaras, which I reached about noon next day. Nothing can compare with the darkness and idolatry I witnessed in this sacred city. It is situated on one side of the river Ganges, and as seen from the great bridge stretches along the bank of the river for three miles; the houses are very high, with stone steps leading down to the water. A mosque, with two high minarets, forms a striking part of the scene.

The highest hope of every Hindu is to die on these shores or in sight of the stream; so the side of the river on which the city is built is filled with the dead and dying, as well as with pilgrims who have come to bathe in its waters that they may be cleansed. I never saw so many dead and dying together in my life; and because this is a sacred city the women, even of the higher caste, are allowed to go out to bathe. I saw these poor creatures in great numbers down in the stream bathing and praying. Higher up I saw numbers dying. Some of them are set down just as they breathe their last.

Here also are the burning ghats where a number of the dead were being disposed of. As soon as any die they are brought down to the river on a bamboo stretcher, carried on the heads of coolies; this is placed at the water's edge with the feet in the river while the pyre is prepared. The remains are then placed on the pyre and the nearest relative applies the torch; one widow was burning her husband, a son a father and parents their children—it was an awful sight. In less than an hour the whole pile, bones and all, is consumed and the ashes scattered on the river. Here and there are small stones that mark the places where widows threw themselves into the fire, preferring this to the awful brand of widowhood. There has never been a law or even a custom of the land that compelled the widows to be burned, but many of them prefer this death to the living death of the disgrace of widowhood. A widow's hair is cut, her head shaved, all her jewelry and good clothes are taken away, and she sinks to a place far worse than a servant. One poor creature who had just burned her husband wailed and shrieked horribly.

As we moved past the dead and dying, we saw the awful and sickening sight of the fakirs crawling through dust for miles, till it had settled in the hair, face, ears and eyes and they looked more like beasts than human beings, their flesh torn on the sharp stones. Another one had been lying for three weeks on three large spikes, driven into a board and all this is done to "work out their own salvation." One had died and he was set up against a brick wall, tailor fashion, and decorated with sacred flowers, and many had fallen upon their faces to worship him.

In this same city is the well of knowledge; an old priest sits at its mouth, draws up a pail of water and those wishing a fresh stock of wisdom pay a price and drink. Many throw in sacred flowers, and looking down the eye rests on floating and decaying matter, quite enough to produce cholera.

Here, too, I visited the cow and monkey temple; in one were a number of sacred cows, and hundreds had come into this place of indescribable filth to make some sacrifice to the sacred animal. The upper part of the temple is occupied by women of the lowest type and most depraved character; these are regarded as the special property of the priests—and this hotbed of sin is a temple. All the other heathenism my eyes have seen cannot compare with the degradation of this so-called "Holy City."

At the monkey temple where these creatures run about at will, the scene was even more sickening. Among their gods is one who is ever crying out for blood, so goats are brought in numbers and sacrificed before this image; the goat's head is cut off, the blood sprinkled on the altar and the flesh sold. Here we see the monkey in numbers, goats alive, dead and half-dead, the head in one place and the body in another, some kicking and others crying out in almost human tones; it beggars description.

Temperance sentiment among the natives, who have a society, is very strong, though there is no temperance association among the Europeans. The union was dead past all hope of life and as I could not find a woman to take it up, outside of the missionaries, I did not revive it, for it is quite useless to depend on missionaries to carry it on; they are already overworked and nearly every station is under-manned. In Calcutta we found an outside woman, so we reorganized, but I have only started unions where I could find such a woman. The union at Lucknow has lived; so have those at Madras and Calcutta, but aside from these they have had to give up, and the work can never go on till we have temperance missionaries to live in this land. We need and must have five, or our work can never take root and I do not see why some of the good people are not willing to supply W. C. T. U. missionaries just as others are supported. It is no use to expect any support in this land for the very conditions prevent the collection of a single penny here. I think it is a serious reflection on our organization to expect such a thing as self-support of our missionaries, and I am sure we can never make our influence felt in this land till we send five or six good women here and support them in the field.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Since writing my last letter to THE UNION SIGNAL the National government has passed under a new administration. One of the saddest features of the inauguration was the amount of liquor drinking and intoxication.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District held a praise service on Sunday afternoon, March 5, to express thanksgiving that the proposed Sunday concert at the Pension building had been prohibited by the administration, and for the Sunday closing of the World's Fair. The meeting was at the Congregational church, Mrs. Sarah D. LaFetra, presiding, and the late Col. Elliott Shepard, president of the American Sabbath Union, and who was its real support, delivered an interesting address. Mrs. Catlin, superintendent of Sabbath observance, and several others made appropriate remarks.

The fact that both the outgoing and the incoming administrations expressed disapprobation of the Sunday concert was a great victory for the American Sabbath, and one which will have an extended influence. If the Pension building had been used for a Sunday concert other places would in all probability have been opened for Sunday amusement and the continental Sabbath on American soil would have gained a new footing.

The writer did not attend the inaugural ball, but understands that intoxicating liquors were sold without regard to the laws of the District of Columbia. At the east side of the Pension building was a room where liquors were on sale and any one could buy a bottle of champagne or whisky, and I am informed that the room was laden with tobacco smoke and fumes of liquors—a regular bar-room atmosphere. Three kinds of wines were printed upon the supper menu. It is an outrage that a government building should be used for the sale of liquor and especially on the occasion of a presidential inauguration.

The last Congress enacted a new license law for the District of Columbia, which has several restrictive features. One paragraph, which may enable the courts to secure some control over liquor dealers, provides that no person who has been convicted of a violation of the liquor laws shall be granted a license. The new law also provides that no minor under sixteen years of age shall be allowed to enter any place where liquors are sold, other than a hotel, without the consent of the parents or guardian of such minor.

Druggists or apothecaries are not required to obtain license under the provisions of the act, but are not allowed to sell intoxicating liquors except upon the written prescription of a reputable physician.

The license for retail dealers is fixed at $400, and for wholesale dealers at $200. The penalty for selling without license from $250 to $800 and imprisonment in the jail from two to six months.

The law prohibits saloons from selling on Sunday or after twelve o'clock at night, but allows the excise board to issue special permit to clubs to sell to members and guests between such hours as they may deem fit. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union made a fight against this feature of the bill, and presented a petition to the Senate, praying that clubs should not be favored, but all to no purpose.

Under the old law the liquor dealer was obliged to secure the signature of the majority of property owners near his place of business each time he applied for a license. Under the new law this is required but once. This is regarded by the temperance advocates as one of the worst features of the bill, and they fought it, but the liquor dealers contended strenuously, and were more influential with Congress, so this clause of the bill passed at their dictation. It certainly is an unwarranted privilege for a liquor dealer to have perpetual right to secure a license. Suppose the property owners in the vicinity should change; surely the new owners should have the right to say that they do not want a saloon in their neighborhood. The new law does not permit a saloon to be opened near a church or schoolhouse, but, if the church or schoolhouse is erected after the saloon has been opened the saloon may not be removed,—the saloon has right of way over religion and education. The one feature of the measure that gives some hope to the temperance element here, is that which provides that no person who has been convicted of violating the liquor law shall be given a license.

There is to be an organization formed whose object shall be to apprehend and prosecute dealers who violate the law and prevent the renewal of a license. The leaders of this movement expect that some ten thousand law and order loving people will join this organization. An effort will be made to begin the much needed work at once. There are hundreds of liquor dealers, it is said, who have violated the law.

On the Sunday following the inauguration liquor selling was very general in Washington. One hotel, the Arlington, showed enough respect for law to close its bar, but many sold without regard to the laws of God or man. It may be said truthfully that the liquor dealers of the District are not entirely pleased with the new law as it passed Congress. They would have preferred fewer restrictions.

Washington, D. C.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Ye should earnestly contend for the faith.—Jude 1·3.

Letters of sympathy pour in from all parts of the country; not a single letter of an opposite character has been received. These not alone from our white-ribboners, but from men in all walks of life, clergymen, lawyers and doctors. Hot indignation is expressed by all against the attempt to deliberately wreck a great enterprise which is for the benefit of a holy cause. It pains me to again allude to this matter, but a certain sensational Chicago evening paper that has no regard for the truth, has been made the vehicle of continued assaults since the more reputable papers have closed their columns to such attacks. The fusilade has been kept up with but two or three days intermission since my return from California a month ago. And this is not all; the paper above referred to has been sent all over the country. Its utterances have no weight in Chicago, but out of the city where its character is unknown it cannot but work mischief to our cause. Letters come to me from different states, charging that the enemies of the Temple must have in possession a copy of THE UNION SIGNAL mailing list, as it is impossible in any other way to account for persons receiving so generally the papers containing the untruthful charges made against the Temple management. Neal Dow, the honored and revered father of prohibition, sends a letter, a few of the mildest lines being given with our only object the vindication of the truth. The "grand old man" says: "I have this morning read your admirable reply in the Inter-Ocean, and in THE UNION SIGNAL. It is a great joy to me to see how thoroughly you use up the man to whose attack your reply was addressed. I have no words which can give expression to the feeling caused by the attempt to injure, if not ruin, the Temple scheme and to smirch your character." The following circular letter has been sent out by Mr. H. C. Speer, the banker who negotiated our Temple Trust bonds:

Sensational telegrams, which you will observe are "special telegrams," not through the reliable medium of the Associated Press, have recently gone out from this city reflecting upon the management of Mrs. M. B. Carse, and necessarily the Board of Temple Trustees. This vicious onslaught upon a Board of women, composed of Mrs. Susan S Fessenden, of Massachusetts; Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, of Missouri; Mrs. Marion H. Dunham, of Iowa; Mrs. Helen M. Barker, of South Dakota; Mrs. Harriet B. Kells, one of the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL; Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, of Ohio; Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Maine; Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, of Michigan; Lady Henry Somerset, of England, and Miss Frances E. Willard, is cowardly, mendacious and cruel. It apparently hesitates at nothing in its evident object of breaking down the contributions of women and their friends to the Temple, (1) by asserting the moneys are ill spent, (2) by asserting the Temple of little value, (3) that the W. C. T. U. can never hold it if offered to them, (4) that these associates of Mrs. Carse are "a set of dupes and dummies!" Doubtless all readers of THE UNION SIGNAL will see Mrs. Carse's reply to the most important of these attacks. Its publication in the newspapers of Chicago has redoubled the great local interest in this movement to endow the National W. C. T. U. and doubly impresses this community with the fact that the management is not only scrupulously honest, but clear in its plans and safe in their accomplishment. This controversy was started by Mr. Hobbs in a six column "interview" in the "Chicago Tribune," and on that side followed by a sensational report of a so-called "interview" with E. G. Keith, President of the Metropolitan National Bank, pronouncing the bonds worthless. The substance of this last was telegraphed boldly to the "Boston Journal" of March 22. As to the merits of the general controversy, Mrs. Carse's reply being published, and both sides judged, I cannot serve you better, perhaps, than to quote editorial expressions from leading Chicago journals that have so far noticed the matter editorially.

Then follows four able editorials, all giving most hearty approval of the Temple enterprise. I append an exact copy of a letter from E. G. Keith, denouncing the "fake" interview with him:

MRS. M. B. CARSE, March 25, 1893.

DEAR MADAM:—My attention has been called to a dispatch in the "Boston Journal," of March 22, in which I am quoted as saying that certain Temple Trust bonds are, in my opinion, utterly worthless, etc. I desire to say that I never made such a statement, and that there is no foundation for such a report.

My remembrance of a private conversation had with regard to this matter was that I agreed with an assertion made that the bonds were as good as the Temple stock. That stock is, I am sure, worth as much or more than when the bonds were issued, and from reports which I believe to be reliable should regard the security as in a fair way to be dividend paying, and if so the stock should be valued at par. I sincerely regret that any one should misconstrue my language, and I am unable to explain how any one could honestly misrepresent me in this manner.

Yours truly, E. G. KEITH.

I send this circular letter to all customers holding Temple Trust bonds to allay causeless fears as to their investment, which was represented to them as good. Bondholders are in perfectly safe position in any event, protected by the collateral stock. This vile attack is intended to undermine the contributions; had it been successful the misfortune would have been to the National W. C. T. U., and the supposed gain to such designing persons as would be able to buy bonds of panic-stricken holders at a sacrifice, and thus succeed to this valuable stock or the par value of the bonds! Fortunately the scheme falls flat, promptly understood by an indignant public.

Yours truly, H. C. SPEER.

I am glad to say that not a bondholder has been stampeded. The following letter to Mr. Speer from Mrs. E. B. Murdock, Baltimore, Md., one of the largest holders of bonds, expresses the feeling of all bondholders yet heard from: "Thanks for the circular received in relation to Mrs. Carse and the Temple. With the fullest confidence in her management and without a shadow of distrust in the value of the investment, I am glad to have at hand such a clear and compact statement of the matter for the sake of others. I believe the attack and its triumphant refutation will only serve to quicken interest in this great enterprise and stimulate the gifts of its friends." Mrs. Murdock is right in her conclusion; Already thousands have been pledged since this attack towards the purchase of the entire capital stock, and this, too, outside of temperance ranks. Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee, and the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain.

IN THE "NINETIES" WE SHALL WIN.

Long centuries have rolled away
While strong drink reigned supreme;
The promise of a brighter day
Seemed but a poet's dream.
Brave souls toiled on 'neath midnight skies,
And watched for morning star;
A land redeemed from drink—the prize—
Lay hopelessly afar.

Chorus:—

In the "nineties" we shall win
In the "nineties" we shall win!
When the people have the power
Will the golden age begin;
Prohibition angel, hail!
Each slave of drink release,
And sheltered neath thy pure white wings,
Our land shall rest in peace.

The long night-watch is over now,
With raptured eyes we see
There sparkles on the mountain-brow
The dawn of Jubilee!
Soon, soon shall close each tempter's door,
And end the reign of wrong,
The drunkard's child will sob no more,
And sighing change to song.

Our banner proudly floats above
Crusaders true and brave,
And sisters' messages of love
Thrill o'er Atlantia's wave;
The path of triumph still we tread,
God's earth shall soon be fair,
While giant evils bow their head,
Our cause wins everywhere!

A PAIR OF KIDS.

How Two Children Turned the Tide of Battle on Election Day.

The excitement was intense.

The contest had been a long and a fierce one.

The liquor men had confidently predicted a victory of two to one for "license."

The liquor league had never been so thoroughly organized, and it was well known that an unlimited amount of money had been at its command.

It had carried on a vigorous war of falsehood and intimidation. Business men had been coerced into silence or open advocacy of license.

The day of battle had arrived.

"License or no-license," was the question.

Bands of children paraded the streets, singing gospel songs. Women were at work at the polls, pleading with the voters to vote for no-license.

Mothers entreated for the sake of their wayward boys.

Wives implored for the sake of desolate homes and starving children.

Daughters labored for the sake of once loving, but now cruel fathers.

A little after the noon hour a great crowd was gathered around the polling place.

The manager of the liquor forces was heard to say:

"Boys, we're all right. There ain't enough temperance people in this whole town to defeat us now. We have the 'stuff,' an' money goes; see? Prayin' an' preachin' is all right in church, but when it comes to votin', it's business. See that fellow over there? Well, he is a big gun down in that there church, but to-day he voted for license. Why? Business, of course. The business men of this town dare not oppose us, fer they know that we'd turn on the screws; see?"

The speech was received with manifestations of approval by those who heard it, for they well knew that a "license" victory meant an open bar and free beer for some days to come.

Just at this point two little children, a boy and girl, were crowding their way up to the voting booth.

The boy was about nine years old, barefooted, and with ragged clothes. The little girl was about six years old, thinly clad, with little toes peeping out through well-worn shoes. The boy had a firm hold of the little girl's hand, and they seemed determined to reach the voting booth.

As they persistently pushed their way through the crowd, a great, big-fisted, rough looking fellow called out in a rasping voice:

"What do you want!"

"We want to vote," firmly answered the boy.

"Oh, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha-a-a-h! Ho, boys, see here; here's two kids that wants to vote! Oh, ha, ha, ha, ha, hah!"

"Who are they? Put them on that box," shouted a voice.

Instantly the two children were lifted on to the box so that they were in full view of the crowd.

"What do you want to vote for, young uns?" asked the big-fisted fellow.

"We want to vote to close the drunk shops," said the little girl. "Mamma said if there was more votes for local—local—local—"

"Option," added the boy.

"Yes, local option, the drunk shops would be shut up and papa would not get drunk any more, an' never whip mamma an' me an' Jack, but bring all his money home, an' we would get lots of new clothes."

"And," added the little fellow, "we'd have new things in the house; carpets an' chairs an' dishes an' a rocking horse, an' I would get a new suit of clothes an' shoes an' lots of things, so's I could go to school."

"Yes," broke in the little girl, "an' mamma said if there was no drunk shops, Santa Claus would come to our house and bring Jack books and toys, and me a big doll, like the saloon man's little girl has!" And the bright eyes of the little tot fairly sparkled as she drew the picture.

"And," she continued, "me an' Jack come here to vote. Can we?"

What's the matter with the crowd? Why so many handkerchiefs out so suddenly, and why the snuffling and coughing and wiping of eyes? The big-fisted fellow is actually crying! Great big tears are coursing down his cheeks!

"Jerusalem, boys," said he, "I'm going to vote for the boy; who'll vote for the girl?"

From scores of throats came the prompt reply, "I will!"

"Well, then, get in line here, and we'll vote out the 'drunk shops' yet. These kids are goin' to vote a good many times to-day."

How quickly "the boys" got in line. The news of the sudden change spread through the town like wildfire.

Easy-going and faint-hearted temperance and Christian men, whose cry of "You can't do it," had discouraged many a worker, fully expected a liquor victory, and therefore did not consider it worth while to go to the polls, heard the story of "the kids," and were at once aroused.

Business men, who from various reasons had decided not to commit themselves either way, were moved to action, and there was a great flocking to the polls. As every voter arrived, he was at once taken possession of by the boys and asked to "vote for the kids," who were now sitting on a box watching with wonder the long line of voters.

The liquor managers tried to turn back the tide, but without avail. The little children's pathetic appeal had gone down deep into the hearts of that crowd, and no power on earth could induce any of them to vote for the "drunk shops," that had made life so dark and miserable and wretched for those innocent children.

When the result was made known, "No-license" had carried the day by a big majority. The church bells rang out their notes of joy and thankfulness. Bonfires were kindled in the public streets. That night a grand union meeting was held in one of the largest churches. The "kids" were on the platform and the story of the day's battle, and how the victory had been won was again related. Every heart was touched.

A great revival of religion was started and the big-fisted fellow and the father of the two little children were among the first to confess their sins and start on a new life. Hundreds of others were converted.

"The kids" realized, under the "no-license" system, the predictions of their mother, for their home was transformed into a little paradise.

No man who voted for "the kids" that day ever regretted his action.—Tallie Morgan.

PHYSICAL TRAINING FOR WOMEN.

BY C. C. B.

A back number of the Independent has so pertinent an introduction to this subject that I quote it verbatim:

"The time is, or ought to be, past when it is necessary to write essays on the importance of physical education and of a knowledge of the laws of hygiene. In fact, to those who admit that it is necessary to train the mind or the moral nature, it ought never to have been necessary to make argument in favor of a corresponding training of the body. It has only been done because, in our material tendencies, we take it for granted that the body will, as we say, take care of itself naturally, while it is assumed that the intellect and the soul are so far dependent and without instinct as to need the special intervention of human drill. The real fact is, that the natural laws of these are oftenest disobeyed through the body and its failure to obey the laws of its being.

"The great question of the present is how hygiene is to be taught and how physical education is to be secured. Thus far the prominent method has been that of good advice. We are told what to do, and what not to do. A lecture with no recitation on it, a talk with no comparison of views after it—these have been, and even yet are too much the cheap stock in trade."

To Dr. Nathan Allen, of Lowell, as chairman of the Gymnasium Committee of Amherst College, belongs largely the credit of having first given an enduring basis to physical education in American colleges. In 1861, Amherst made this branch a compulsory part of the college course, and called Dr. Hitchcock to its charge. To-day all first-class colleges require it, provide a professor and adequate apparatus for it, and give it a curriculum of its own. There are three systems of which all others are variations. The first is usually named after its chief originator and apostle, perhaps I should say elaborator, Dr. Sargent, of Harvard. The second is the Swedish, the third, the German system. The Sargent system makes prominent individual work upon machines adapted to individual needs as determined by careful and full diagnosis of each separate body. From his own wide experience, and by his graduate teachers scattered through many schools, Dr. Sargent has gathered a large number of physical statistics and from these has determined the perfect body. His system of measurements is his "pet patent." To remedy the variations in each case from this ideal body is the purpose of his prescription of individual exercises.

The Swedish system makes measurements somewhat less than the Sargent), and has many machines for correcting faults. But, as applied in this country, the machines are used only for and by a small fraction of the students, the main work being done in classes. The Sargent system is used in Smith, Vassar, Wellesley, Bryn Mawr, Oberlin, Lasell and the Boston Normal School of Gymnastics; the Swedish system somewhat in Boston and vicinity, in Baltimore College and Bryn Mawr Preparatory School in Baltimore. The latter has the handsomest gymnasium I have seen in any school in this country, Lasell's ranking next. The German system is used principally in the German Turn Halles and societies throughout the country, and (as modified by Carl Betz) in Kansas City, Cleveland, Toledo and a few western cities. A great deal of the class work that Dr. Sargent uses, as well as the work on the heavy apparatus—parallel bars, vaulting horse, ladders, etc., has been highly developed by the Germans, and he has drawn largely upon their experience for a good deal of his school work.

Dr. Anderson, of Brooklyn, has what he calls an American system, which, so far as a non-expert can see, is a mixture of the first two, having more of the Swedish than the Sargent in its practice—more class than personal work. The gymnasiums of the Y. M. C. Associations, so far as I have observed them, follow mainly the Sargent system. Indeed, over five hundred school, college, Y. M. C. Associations and athletic club gymnasiums are using his apparatus.

The importance of a regular training adapted to each pupil's needs has gone beyond discussion. Experiment and careful research are adding daily to the appliances for reaching this. If I could not do both together for a pupil under my care I would let the studies go by the board and give her first the physical training. I said to the doctor in charge, the other day, speaking of a puny girl: "She needs a body more than anything else. Give her a body, and let everything else be subordinated to that." Such cases are rare. Usually the physical training and mental go most happily hand in hand, each helping the other.

The sanitary knowledge necessary to the intelligent care of the plumbing of a house, etc., should go with the gymnastics. Lasell Seminary was the first school to give practical teaching, illustrated by all sorts of object lessons, in this branch of sanitary science. Wellesley College has taken up the matter, and is giving it some good attention as an optional. Other schools will see the need of it, and follow suit. Dr. Sargent says: "I fully indorse what you say as to the importance of teaching something of sanitary science in connection with the physical training."

The importance of practical teaching in the preparation of food has also been recognized as an essential part of the curriculum of a practical school for young women. The former president of one of the largest colleges for women in this country recently said, upon Tremont Temple platform: "Teach a girl to make a breakfast for papa; that will be as good an education as she can have." That sentence was rank heresy in the minds of so-called "college" men and women fifteen years ago, when Lasell Seminary boldly began to teach cooking to its pupils.

On the whole, we ought to thank God, who has revealed these needs to teachers, and take courage, especially for our young women. It is her own fault now if every girl is not "thoroughly furnished unto every good word and work."

THE CHILDREN'S FOUNTAIN.

BY MARY E. H. EVERHART.

Grown people bring their treasures rare,
To grace our great Columbian Fair;
Their contributions, wondrous, grand,
Are pouring in on every hand.

Columbia's friends (the children), too,
Desired that they might something do,
To represent them at her Fair
And have their work recorded there.

Miss Gordon, who so nobly stands,
World's leader of our temperance bands,
Decided that their gift should be
Something to help humanity.

A fountain, sparkling, cool and bright,
(Emblem of purity and light)
By which a little child shall stand,
A cup o'erflowing in her hand,

And as its contents plashing fall,
The little one will seem to call,
"Come all who thirst and take a draught,
Nothing so cooling can be quaffed!"

Now temperance children in all lands
Are reaching out their little hands
For dimes and pennies, which shall be
This offering to humanity.

CLOCKS.

No, I haven't told you about half the tools, yet, but here you see I have this old clock which is needing some attention, and I thought I would use it as a text, this time, while we have the opportunity. Matter with it? Not much, as you will soon see; but the little which it needs is of vital importance. In fact, it will not run at all, now, but will, when I have devoted about five minutes to it. All it wants is a little oil in two places. No use to oil anything else than the escapement wheel and the anchor-pin,—using a broom-corn. While doing so take off the anchor and let the wheels fly for a minute or two. Yes, the place that ticks; but let us come at it semi-scientifically.

The pendulum does not make the clock go, but the clock makes the pendulum go, and the pendulum holds the clock from running away. Imagine yourself standing in the middle of a level piece of ground, with a pole in your hands, say fifty feet long. Hold it by one end and swing the other end around in a large circle. Imagine a railing for the outer end to rest on. Now see how important a little oil would be on this railing. A little friction there would prevent you from moving the pole. A child could hold it with one finger.

Now let my little three-year-old Bessie, bless her heart, here she comes just as I was speaking of her, let her take hold of the end of the pole and toddle along by the railing so that you cannot move the pole any faster than she walks; yes, that is the machinery of a clock. You are the spring or weight; the pole is a long lever for reducing the power to a point where it can be easily handled, just as the wheels are, and Bessie is the pendulum. Here you see the spring.

Let us assume some figures for easy reckoning. Say that this spring exerts a force at the edge of this large wheel to which it is fastened of ten pounds, and that each little wheel is one-tenth the size of the large ones. Then the force of the second wheel would be only one pound; the third, one-tenth of a pound; the fourth, one-hundredth; and the fifth, one-thousandth, and this is our escapement wheel, the one that ticks. And as the power decreases, of course the speed increases; that is, this wheel must turn one thousand times around while the spring wheel turns once. Now you see the importance of oil on the axle of this wheel. The others turn so slowly that they do not need it. Still, I never can resist the temptation to oil at least one more.

Now comes the pendulum. It swings by its own weight and would soon stop if it did not have help. No, that thin end is not a spring. It is made thin so that it will not be a spring, and of metal so that it will not vary with temperature and moisture, as a string would. This anchor, you see, swings on a pin at its center, so that the hooks at the ends just reach well into the teeth of the escapement-wheel. A wire from the anchor connects with the pendulum-wire, and gives it a little push with every movement. To understand this, take the pendulum in your hand and move it slowly back and forth, watching the escapement, and remembering that the wheel is trying to go faster, and the anchor is holding it back. Do not oil the anchor. If you do anything, you may polish the surfaces where the points touch. The weight of a pendulum has but little to do with the rapidity of its beats, while the length has everything to do with it; hence the variation in length used to regulate the clock.

The five-minute warning? Well, suppose the striking-machinery to be held by a wire between the teeth of a wheel. Now, when the minute-hand comes along and lifts it out, the wheel turns and the clock strikes. And it will go on striking until the hand has moved along far enough to let go of that wire so that it may drop into its notch. It would be impossible to adjust this to anything moving as slowly as the hand of a clock. It would either fail to strike or fail to stop striking. So this long wire, operated by the minute-hand, lifts the hook out of its notch, and the wheel starts, but is caught by the long wire itself, which has been lifted up for the purpose. Now, when the hand reaches twelve, it drops the long wire, which then falls out of the way, leaving the wheel free to turn, and the hook free to stop it whenever the counting-wheel gives its permission.

With this hint of explanation of the principle, you can understand a clock by a little examination. No oil needed for the striking-machinery, except for the fan and one other wheel, just as we did on the other side.

Look here, chicks, never bet on anything that has an element of uncertainty in it; but if any one else dares bet against your certain knowledge, I think you may venture to "take him up" for a little sport. For example, you may undertake, on a wager of two good apples, to make a clock strike without touching the hammer, or the wire, or moving the hand past twelve, and you will not change the hand on its post, either. To do it, you move the hand up until you hear the warning, and then turn it back toward nine.

For three apples you may undertake to make the clock run 65 minutes without striking. Simply turn the hand backwards to 11, or as far as it will go. No harm to turn a clock backwards unless you try to pass the point, generally between 11 and 10, where the arm on the shaft of the minute-hand strikes that long wire. A non-striking clock may be turned either way. When a clock stands on a permanent shelf, or is attached to the wall, and limps, do not wedge it up or loosen the screws, but bend the pendulum wire. Say it limps to the right, make an elbow to the left, at any point of the wire, but if possible up out of sight. It will run just as well, and you save a great deal of trouble.

Here's a little mental arithmetic for you: Have a person think of a number, twelve or less. Tell him to start with that number and count to twenty, while you mark time on the table, he to speak the word twenty aloud. Then you will tell him the number he thought of. You do it by starting on 8, and following the figures of the clock backwards. When he says twenty, you will be on the number he started with. Vary by using pieces of paper, figures turned down, and tapping here and there with your pencil while keeping your place mentally, and then turning up the proper figure.

When will the hands be together after 12? Sixty is 11-12ths of the time after 12. When after 3? Fifteen is 11-12ths of the time after 3. When after 10? Fifty is 11-12ths, etc.

Now skip. This old clock will not miss a tick for three months.

THE BOY THAT LAUGHS.

I know a funny little boy—
The happiest ever born;
His face is like a beam of joy,
Although his clothes are torn.

I saw him tumble on his nose,
And waited for a groan—
But how he laughed! Do you suppose
He struck his funny-bone?

There's sunshine in each word he speaks,
His laugh is something grand;
Its ripples overrun his cheeks
Like waves on snowy sand.

He laughs the moment he awakes,
And till the day is done;
The school-room for a joke he takes—
His lessons are but fun.

No matter how the day may go,
You cannot make him cry;
He's worth a dozen boys I know,
Who pout and mope and sigh.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Such a variety of ways the Cozy Corner letters are addressed! Here is one to "Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner, Temperance Temple, Chicago, Ill.," which, in spite of the fact that the Temple is thirteen stories high and full of nooks and corners, came right up to Aunt Jane's den on the eleventh floor. The little nephew who wrote on his envelope,

CHICAGO, ILL.,
COR. MONROE AND LASALLE STS.,
THE TEMPLE,
AUNT JANE'S COZY CORNER.

did get "the cart before the horse," but his letter reached me just the same. And when I received a nice letter addressed to "THE UNION SIGNAL, Chicago, in care of Aunt Jane," I laughed most heartily. If you want to be sure, however, that your letter reaches me safely and want to please the busy post-office clerks who handle, stamp and deliver it, just remember to address it thus:

EDITOR, THE UNION SIGNAL,
THE TEMPLE,
CHICAGO,
AUNT JANE'S COZY CORNER. ILL.

Isn't your Uncle John's "clock" talk a good one? I understand clock works much better since reading it, don't you?

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

I was a member of the Juvenile Temple as long as we had one, but now all the temperance boys and girls have moved away except me. I am the only one in our little town of about five hundred inhabitants. I am going to send ten cents for the children's fountain.

THE GREAT MISSION.

This is, preëminently, the age of missions. The evangelizing spirit is abroad in the earth. Men are drawing nearer to each other in heart as the inventions of man's brain and the work of his hands are annihilating space and bringing widely separated nations together. By the very spirit of the age, the man to whom has come the possession of "good tidings," finds himself impelled to make known those tidings to others.

This is true, not in the Christian church alone; it is becoming true of those isms which claim for themselves an altitude far above Christianity. Witness the aggressive missionary efforts of Theosophy as embodied in Madam Blavatsky and her school, especially in her who has become the Elisha to this modern prophet, Mrs. Besant.

The same fact may be observed in the non-Christian religions of to-day. Buddhism and Mahometanism especially are passing through an epoch of missionary zeal, which, if it continue, will make the visit of Mahomet Webb to this country only a prophecy of what may be expected in days to come.

So far from looking with apprehension upon this phase of the subject, it seems to us a hopeful indication of the coming universal recognition of the brotherhood of man, that nation should reach out hands to nation, and even heathen lands should seek to give to others of that which, to them, is best.

In religion, more fully than in anything else, it can only be the fittest which shall survive; therefore we need not fear the comparison of Christianity with any other system. Indeed, it needs only this comparison to prove that. Whatever may have been the truths embodied in other religions, Christianity alone can claim a universal adaptation to the needs of humanity.

But it is upon the missionary spirit as manifested in Christianity itself that our interest must center. Believing, as we do most absolutely, that the fullest revelation of truth the world can ever know was shown forth eighteen hundred years ago in Galilee; realizing that, while

> "God may have other words for other worlds,
> But, for this world, the word of God is Christ," it becomes the chief concern of each genuine Christian that that "word of God," with its utmost possible meaning, should be fully made manifest.

At no other period since the days of the early church have the missionary spirit and the missionary zeal so permeated Christendom. One wonders, indeed, in looking back, that, with Christ's "Go ye into all the world" standing out so clearly from the record of His life, there should have intervened so long an era in which those words were known, but not obeyed.

A Christian church without missionary zeal, must be, upon the very face, a contradiction of terms. The very essence of Christianity is the spirit of giving, and that men should rejoice in the revelation of God through Jesus Christ, without seeking to give to others this revelation, is unthinkable.

Those to whom our missionaries go realize this truth, if the church in the main does not. "If Jesus died for us so many years ago, why have you not come to tell us before?" is asked again and again in China.

Since the measure of the love of God for the world must lie in the fact that He "gave his only begotten Son for its redemption," so the measure of the God-likeness begotten in His children, through the spirit of Christ, must lie in the degree to which they are willing to give of time, strength, treasure, life itself for others. "Herein perceive we the love of God, in that he laid down his life for us, and we ought also to lay down our lives for the brethren," when widened to God's measure to embrace a universal humanity, becomes the final test of the follower of Jesus Christ.

Poorly do we meet this test, and yet no previous age has met it so fully. The missionary movements of to-day, both at home and abroad, while wholly inadequate to the demand, are still on a gigantic scale, as compared with anything which has preceded them. The most conservative churches, those which have, hitherto, held aloof from missionary work, are awakening to its necessity.

More money is being contributed each year through the regularly authorized channels, while the number of individuals giving themselves to the work through the media of self-supporting missions is well-nigh incalculable.

The missionary propaganda, as carried on in the colleges of our own country and of Great Britain, has awakened in the minds of many who were standing with questioning step upon the threshold of life such a sense of the needs of the world and the blessedness of Christly giving as has turned their feet into the stormy but glorious path of a life poured out for others. The China Inland Mission is one of the latest and noblest answers to the oft-recurring problem, "How can we reach the masses?" The college settlement idea is answering the same question in our own land.

The Salvation Army is the great divinely appointed missionary agency of modern times. The roll of its drum beat and the flash of its colors are making their way into all lands, and everywhere they tell the same story of an absolute self-abnegation; a giving up, even to the death, that others may know the power of an eternal life.

Bishop Taylor in Africa and Bishop Thoburn in India, with the long roll of illustrious boards, agencies and mystic letters which go to the making up of each denomination's peculiar shibboleth, all, to a greater or less degree, tell the same story; and we feel that we are in no sense encroaching upon the prophetic function when we claim that this zeal will increase rather than diminish in the years just before us, and that the next decade will witness such an advance along mission lines, the world over, as our fathers never dreamed of.

Small wonder that the W. C. T. U. has taken upon itself missionary work. It would have proven itself lacking the vital principle of life if it had failed to do so. Mary Clement Leavitt setting sail on that memorable journey was the sign and seal of our own fitness to survive. Those who have succeeded her (Jessie A. Ackermann, Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, Dr. Kate Bushnell, Miss Alice Palmer and the late Mary Allen West) have made assurance doubly sure, while the tens and hundreds who shall speedily follow, will not only "wreathe the white ribbon around the world," but will also prove to that world how divine is the origin of our work, and how necessary in order that the kingdoms of this world may become the kingdoms of our Lord.

We are confronted again and again by the question, "Why send out special W. C. T. U. missionaries? Why multiply agencies in lands where multiplication of numbers too frequently means reduction of force? Why not trust to the agencies already in the field, to the simple gospel methods of bringing the individual sinner to the Saviour for personal salvation, and leave all mere matters of reform to work out their own solution?"

These objections have so plausible a sound that, at the first, one is inclined to question if they be not valid. It is only as we look beneath the surface and see how these "mere matters of reform" stand related to missionary effort, that we see their utter futility.

The truth is that the evils against which the W. C. T. U. has arrayed itself, stand as the mightiest of barriers against the success of Christian missions in any land. Ask your zealous, true-hearted missionary from China, India, Africa, the isles of the sea—from whatever quarter of the globe he may come, what he has found to be the greatest obstacle in the way of the success of his work, and he will answer one or another of the three kindred evils—rum, opium or social impurity. To bring the poor darkened minds to the light of the gospel truth is not so difficult a matter as the making it possible in a land deluged with impurity, reeking with the corruption of ages, for a man to live a follower of Jesus Christ.

For, most pitiful of all, not only have these lands to contend with their own indigenous vices, they have also the vices of civilization superadded. Their knowledge of Christianity frequently consists in the ability to drink and swear. Men who would consider it monstrous to take lightly the names of their own gods use the name of Jehovah as an idle expletive, because they constantly hear it thus used. How then can they be brought to reverence Him?

The drunken and profligate foreigner, whether seen in the person of the sailor, army officer, government official or tradesman, forms, too frequently, the only ideal of a Christian.

The extortion of money at any cost is the practical working out which they have constantly before their eyes, of Christ's law of love. England forcing the opium trade upon China at the cannon's mouth is an object lesson in Christianity which that country is not likely soon to forget.

America—Christian America—sending its hundreds of thousands of gallons of rum annually to heathen Africa, is another object lesson of the same type, and of what avail is it that we send missionaries to China to preach the gospel of brotherly love, and then, by our infamous anti-Chinese legislation, give the lie to all our teaching?

Remember that these people know nothing of the difference which we recognize between Christians in name and Christians in character. To them the white face is the sign of the "God men," and the "Jesus religion." Alas! what has not that religion been made to cover of crime and barbarity and cruel atrocities in heathen lands! The figures adduced in Mr. Hornaday's pamphlet, "Rum on the Congo," are of a startling nature. We append a few: "In 1886, five nominally Christian nations sent into Africa a total of 10,377,166 gallons of intoxicating liquors. Of this amount 1,099,146 gallons went from the Netherlands; 737,650 gallons from the port of Boston, U. S. A., (it is not stated whether the United States sent from other ports or not); 311,384 gallons from Great Britain; 405,944 gallons from France; and 7,823,042 gallons from Germany."

Mrs. Leavitt says it is impossible to know the amount of liquor sent into Africa. The traders use it as their one medium of exchange. "Drink is the small coin of Africa." She, herself, heard one trader say to another: "Down my way the 'niggers' are getting so impudent they don't want to take what you offer them in trade; they want to choose." "What do they want?" asked the other. "Oh, cloth, salt and money. Think of that! They want money, and they don't want rum!" "That will never do," said number two, "there is nothing we can make so much on as rum!" "They get these notions from the missionaries," said number one. "Yes," said number two, "the missionaries spoil the country for trade!"

We all know that other story Mrs. Leavitt tells of the African chief who, when talking with the missionary, said piteously: "Yes, it all sounds very good. I'd like to have my people embrace this new religion. But they haven't brains enough to do it; the fire water men have burned out their brains and they cannot think now. Why didn't the God men come before the drink men?" Aye! Why did they not; or why, having gone, are they to find their work continually thwarted by this damnable drink traffic foisted upon a weak people by a people that is strong—sent out upon the same vessel which bears the missionary—coming to these darkened minds as being equally with the missionary, the product of Christianity!

Not long ago a white ribbon sister told us that her daughter—a missionary in Africa—in her last letter said that, as she looked from her window while writing, she saw nine men lying upon the street dead drunk from New England rum. She had inclosed ten dollars in the letter, saying: "Mother, use it in missionary work at home—you need it more than we." Was she not right?

Why, if rum could but have been kept from the Congo, we should long ago have witnessed there the mighty phenomenon of a nation born to God in a day. What more pathetic thing in the annals of history than the letter which reached Bishop Crowther from one of the most powerful Emirs in the west of Africa, in which he besought him to intercede with the great home government that barasá (drink) might be kept from his people? Nothing unless it be Dr. Paten's journey to this country on the same mission. Here is a man who, more than a quarter of a century ago, went out to take the truth of Jesus Christ, the Saviour, to the naked cannibals of the New Hebrides. He has met, faced and conquered death in almost every form of terror; he has won this people to God, and now he sees the awful danger staring him in the face that his work is to be overthrown through the greed of a Christian (?) nation which is pouring liquid damnation into the midst of the land he has so painfully purchased for truth.

"Mere matters of reform"? Who that has eyes can fail to see that the temperance question with all it involves to-day, is the key to the problem of all missionary effort! Never, until this be solved, can the work of God in foreign lands take on its proper proportions. Never, until this be solved, can we intelligently and consistently pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

The woman who, in answer to the question why she does not join the W. C. T. U., answers that she is not interested in temperance work, her interest all centers in missions, either has not looked into the matter or else lacks entirely the logical mind which should show her that temperance work as embodied in the W. C. T. U. is mission work par excellence; that never till the one becomes an integral part of the other can victory be assured.

If every Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, aye, and every Woman's Home Missionary Society were affiliated with the W. C. T. U., if every missionary at home and abroad but wore the white ribbon and disseminated white ribbon light, we should find the millennium advancing upon us with strides which would gladden both earth and heaven.

But alas! that day is yet to come. Many missionaries themselves need white ribbon light not less than those to whom they minister. That Bombay conference, reported in THE UNION SIGNAL, will yet come to be regarded by the entire world as one of the most disgraceful blots upon the history of the Christian church. Think of seven hundred Christian missionaries refusing to condemn, by even so small a measure as a resolution, the triple evils of the drink trade, the opium traffic and the state regulation of vice! It is good to know that the American missionaries, under the leadership of Bishop Thoburn, took radical ground against these evils, but the disgrace is to the church of Christ, which knows no bound of nature.

May God forgive those who thus parody the name of Him who came to "save His people from their sins"; who came to make of this world, not the next, a clean, true place, and who never hesitated to condemn any evil because of its entrenchment behind custom or its hold upon popular prejudice!

AN OUTRAGEOUS CHARGE.

Several weeks ago a certain Chicago paper, whose title shall be nameless, because its contents are a disgrace to journalism, contained a false and cowardly charge against the bindery of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. The article was instigated by a discharged employé and written by a sensational reporter for a sensational newspaper. The statements were at such utter variance with the truth and published in such an unscrupulous paper that we decided to take no notice of them. Our silence was distressing to the editors. They sent numerous reporters to the business manager and others, endeavoring to obtain a retraction for their disreputable columns which they could have the pleasure of attacking editorially. We refused to be interviewed by any such medium. The result is a casting abroad of the false statements all over the country. The article has come to us through friendly hands from Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, New Jersey and Canada and it is safe to surmise that it has been republished wherever an editor could be found who is unfriendly to the W. C. T. U. and doubtless many have been deceived into believing it true. Because of this we must here deny each and every statement contained in the charge and brand it the work of an enemy.

The article states that the bindery "is a filthy little room about 12 by 12 feet, filled with "huge crates of worthless paper." By actual measurement it is 25 by 27 feet and is kept in good order and as clean as any such a room can be. There are "crates of paper" in the room, to be sure, for our business requires such material, but it is not "worthless."

The malicious reporter continues: "Going down a loose, board stairway into the basement of the Mercantile building the reporter found himself in a long, narrow hallway. To the left was a saloon and to the right a small hole in the wall which led to a stuffy pressroom. Passing through this apartment the visitor at last found himself fairly in the pest-hole." There is one good elevator and two substantial stairways, not "loose boards." We cannot dispute the presence of the "saloon" in this building any more than we can in hundreds of similar buildings in this rum-cursed city. The door into the bindery is full standard in size, and not "a small hole in the wall." There is no necessity of passing through the pressroom (which is no more "stuffy" than all pressrooms) to reach the bindery, as it opens directly from the hall.

"And it was a sight, indeed," he continues. "Crowded closely around half a dozen worn out incandescent globes were twelve girls, whose pinched features told only too plainly of the want of fresh air. Not a gleam of daylight ever reaches the little hole, though there are three windows opening on the alley. These, however, are below the level of the ground and serve only one purpose—the admitting of a current of foul air from the filthy passage." This is another paragraph containing positive falsehoods. The floor of this basement story is about three feet below the sidewalk, but the windows are large, and over one-half of them extends above the surface of the ground. The air is just such as is found in all places of this kind, and while the smell of paste and melting glue is not pleasant to uninitiated nostrils, it is not death-dealing in its effects.

The reporter's imagination and malice finally run riot and he discourses pathetically on "rats," "pinched faces," and "prayers for alleviation of suffering," all of which were in his own lively brain.

Other charges are of "low pay, much sickness," etc. The present quarters have been occupied over five years for this purpose; the pay-rolls show that no unusual amount of sickness has prevailed, no more than in the other department of the business, or in other shops.

That Mrs. Carse and the W. T. P. A. have made every effort to have the best place attainable for their employés is shown by the fact that they sacrificed several thousand dollars rather than put the mechanical department into a building where an undesirable industry was brought next door, after taking a nine-year lease.

The reporter's statement of ex-employés' stories really shows the whole animus of the attack; that such statements should have been given the dignity of a newspaper article is strange, when one remembers that ex-employés are usually biased as to the places they have been forced to leave.

THE UNION SIGNAL does not fear a comparison with the pay or the treatment of employés of any similar or other institution where so large a number of women is employed. All piece work, whether in the bindery or the composing room, is paid full union scale. In the bindery the minimum week's wages are $7.00 per week and from that up, in the other departments full union scale is paid, further than this every salaried employé, including those in the bindery, who has been with the firm one year or more, receives a week's vacation with full pay.

The owners of the building have an efficient force that looks after the building and keeps it in repair. Mrs. Carse and the women who are associated with her are in close touch with their employés, and any suggestion or complaint from any one receives prompt and careful consideration.

We trust that interested friends will secure the publication of this editorial in every paper that has printed the charges, and if possible have it emphasized by editorial mention. This is due us, for we have been fearfully maligned.

DISCIPLINE in the army has been defined as "that which makes it more dangerous for the soldier to go back than to go on." It is that sort of discipline which must be applied to the present political parties in England and America, that they may stand by such temperance legislation as we have secured and go on to give us that which shall be better still.

THE man who deliberately goes where he knows he will be tempted, unless he has a call of God to go there, virtually makes an appointment with the devil. The Arabs have a proverb: "To think about vice is vicious." There is a great deal said in the newspapers about the fool who blows in the muzzle of a loaded gun, or attempts to light a fire with a kerosene oil can, but neither of these is to be compared in folly with the young man who makes and keeps an appointment with wild and dissolute companions, whom he knows will go to places, and deal with forms of sin, which he has always been taught to shun as he would a reptile. He cannot even plead the excuse of the man who thought the gun was not loaded. Everybody knows that intoxicating drinks are loaded. Every sensible person knows that bad company is loaded. Yet there are hundreds of boys who have been taught from their youth up that the billiard saloon is loaded, that the knot of street-corner loafers and the village owl gang are loaded, that the novel which they read under their desk at school is loaded, and that the cigar and pipe and barrel of hard cider are loaded; yet they persist in blowing down the muzzle of the gun.

Canon Wilberforce says that "the crucifix is the emblem of humanity nailed to the cross of circumstance."

"This is a great disappointment," groaned a temperance worker in presence of a "set-back." "No, I do not look upon it in that light," responded a cheery-voiced white-ribboner. "Take off the 'dis' and you have a word that ought to make us calm under all circumstances—'appointment' not 'disappointment.'"

In this world we have a right to judge of outward acts but not of inward motives. Aggregates of persons we have a right to condemn as aggregates, but not as individuals; and yet no phrase is more apt to be flung from our lips at any with whom we are not of accord than, "I should not have done that." But wherever we use these words we are scrambling into Christ's judgment seat, where setting ourselves up as universal standards we lift our sceptres and proceed to pronounce sentence. Let us remember that none are more likely to err in judgment than ourselves. A more egotistical phrase than, "I should not have done that," was never coined as a counterfeit of holiness. May we strive to replace it in our mint of speech by this, "Had I been in my neighbor's place should I have done as well?"

The popular notion that Lord Beaconsfield was fond of primroses grew out of the fact that at his funeral Queen Victoria sent a beautiful wreath of primroses with the inscription, "His favorite flower," but all the time she meant Prince Albert.

A few years ago a Chinaman who had married an Irish girl in New York willed his unborn child to his relatives in China. The child was born after the death of the father and the barbarous laws of that Christian state permitted the Chinese relatives to take the child from its mother. Perhaps this and other occurrences of like character have awakened the sense of justice in the legislators of New York. Certain it is that both houses have now unanimously repealed the statute and made the mother joint guardian with the father. This is now the sixth state in the union where this simplest principle of justice is recognized. The others are Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Oregon and Washington. The unaccountable wonder is that it is not so in forty-four instead of six.

"Whisky is your greatest enemy," said a pastor to an intemperate man.

"Well, doesn't the Bible tell us to love our enemies?"

"Yes," said the pastor gravely, "but it doesn't tell us to swallow them."

The Bible is the most political of books because it recognizes more clearly than any other that God must rule in politics else the devil surely will. We firmly believe that the patient work of Christian women will so react upon politics within the next generation that the party of God will be at the forefront, and Christian men will be as much ashamed to say that they never go to the political meeting or the polls as they would be to use profane language or to defame character; for there is just one question that every Christian patriot is bound to ask: "What is the relation of this party, this platform, this candidate to the setting up of Christ's kingdom on the earth? How does my vote relate to the Lord's prayer?"

General Booth's method of raising money is one that might well be taken up in the white ribbon societies of the world. He forwards from headquarters a little box which is to be kept on the table at home and money is to be placed there on Sunday morning at the breakfast table as a thanksgiving offering. This would cost very little trouble and the boxes should be examined once a month or once a quarter, by women appointed for the purpose in each local society; indeed, the entire work should be done by the local societies and in my judgment they ought to have a percentage of the total for their trouble. This is simple and effective machinery but it requires the systematic enthusiasm of our workers in the localities to put steam into it.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

OUR WINTER'S WORK.

The hardest work these past six months has been our effort to raise our temple debt of twenty-five thousand dollars. Almost everybody, when we started out to do it said, "It cannot be done these hard times, money is too scarce;" but a few of us had the courage and the faith to make the effort spite of all discouraging words.

The unions as unions and members as individuals rallied in a most enthusiastic manner to our call for help. They worked heroically soliciting subscriptions, and they gave small and large sums even to the point of self-sacrifice and hard work to earn the money. They prayed the prayer of faith, many of them daily; indeed, some of us learned as never before to pray without ceasing, and to-day we are singing glad hallelujahs, for our prayers have been answered, and the whole amount of our debt has been subscribed. We are at work now collecting, and we hope in the near future to have the entire indebtedness liquidated and the income from our building used to extend our work.

While time and strength have been given largely to this one object, the legitimate work of the unions has not been neglected. I think on the whole our work is more prosperous and our unions are more active than they have been for the past four years.

Mrs. Bullock, our National organizer, began work in our state, November 20 and continued until March 13. She went through every county but one, speaking, organizing new unions and strengthening those already organized. Despite many drawbacks in the way of an unusually rainy season, her work was very satisfactory. We can sum up her work in a few figures as follows: Number of meetings held, one hundred and ten; new unions organized, eleven; membership of unions increased by active members, five hundred, honorary members, two hundred and sixty-five.

The good results, however, of her work cannot be estimated in numbers. Her large-hearted sympathy with our workers, her quiet but genuine enthusiasm, her interest in our temple, in our Ransom Home and all other lines of work, her words of encouragement to some of the heavy burden-bearers—we cannot work out the results of such beneficent influences by any rule of arithmetic.

One Sunday afternoon while in Los Angeles, Mrs. Bullock spoke in the interest of the Ransom Home upon the subject, "Whose Girls?" Through her plea for help, eleven dollars per month was pledged to help carry on the work, and forty dollars in cash raised. Pasadena and Santa Ana each gave Mrs. Bullock a reception in appreciation of her work and herself. God bless Mrs. Bullock, say all the white-ribboners of Southern California.

Kern county, our last county organized, held its second annual meeting this winter at Delano. The program showed an innovation by the omission of all addresses of welcome and proceeding at once to regular work. The session was one day and evening. Aside from the usual reports of officers and superintendents, there were read an original poem by Mrs. Reynolds, of Delano, and a paper on fiction and its abuse by Mrs. Stockton, president of Bakersfield union; these were followed by a discussion on the relation of the W. C. T. U. work to the church, opened by Mrs. Yancey, of Bakersfield, a paper on sisterhood by Mrs. Wright, of Rondale, and an address in the evening by Rev. J. E. Fischer, of Delano, a staunch brother of the W. C. T. U.

One of the most satisfactory exercises was a question-box. Mrs. S. S. Hunter, the former president, was unanimously reëlected, while the count of the ballots made Mrs. Wright, of Rondale, recording secretary, and Mrs. J. O. Sidener, treasurer for the ensuing year.

The county president of Kern county, writing of the presentation of scientific temperance instruction before the county teachers' institute, says: "I did the best I could in a short paper, and opened the hour, and the teachers followed in quite an animated discussion. Most of them were aroused by the condition in which they found their schoolhouses on the morning after the general election, and I venture to say more instruction has been given since that time than ever before. The county superintendent complimented us on the interest of the hour, and said to me, privately, that he was more than willing to assist us in pushing this matter in the schools."

Memorial services for Miss West have been held by a number of the unions. Those of Pasadena union were especially interesting. The tabernacle, where the services were held, was beautifully decorated with white roses and calla lilies, and although it was a stormy day, there was a good attendance. After singing one verse of "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," Rev. J. P. Phelps led in a most touching prayer. The fourteenth chapter of John, which Miss West asked to have read to her just before her death, was read by the president of the union.

Then Rev. Conger, of Pasadena, an own cousin of Miss West, was presented, and gave a deeply interesting account of her early life and the formative influences that made her the woman she was. Mrs. Bailey, of New York, reviewed her work in Japan. Mrs. St. John spoke briefly, but touchingly, and Governor St. John spoke of her work in general and the lesson to be drawn from it. He said that but for his faith in God, who orders all things right, he could not be reconciled to her death. She never seemed to consider herself by word or act. What Horace Greeley was to the New York Tribune, Mary Allen West was to THE UNION SIGNAL.

Mrs. Bailey, who for the past year has been speaking in the interests of the Prohibition party in New York state, has been with us this winter. She has visited a number of unions and helped them by her practical talk and evening addresses, and organized one union at Clearwater. She is still at work in San Bernardino county. Mrs. Blair, National W. C. T. U. chalk talker, spoke one evening last month to the Pasadena Loyal Temperance Legion.

Major E. T. Scott and wife came to us from Northern California the latter part of February. They have held highly satisfactory meetings at Redondo, Pomona, Ontario, Redlands and South Riverside. At the last mentioned place they organized a union of thirty-two active and thirteen honorary members, which promises to be a strong one. These excellent workers are now in Kern county for a ten days' engagement, when they will return to Los Angeles probably for a month's work and from there to other points in our state further south.

The central union of Los Angeles held its tenth anniversary the 5th of April. It celebrated with an all-day meeting, basket lunch between and a jubilee meeting in the evening for the successful close of the temple canvass, at which Mrs. Leavitt and several of the ministers of the city spoke.

Our legislative work this winter has been largely for equal suffrage. Three bills were introduced into the legislature, one for general, one for municipal, and one for school suffrage. A petition of twenty-three thousand signers was presented and numerous letters were sent. The result was another defeat. The school suffrage bill passed both Houses and received a pocket veto from our governor. In the Senate, which was Republican, there were only six votes against the bill. In the Assembly the best element was for it. The Populists to a man voted for us and saved the bill from defeat. We are not discouraged, but shall go right on making sentiment, for as one judge said to me when I asked him to sign a personal letter to each of the Assemblymen from our district, "We men might as well surrender first as last, for woman suffrage is inevitable."

I understand a law forbidding the manufacture and sale of cigarettes passed, and the attempt of the liquor men of the state to secure a uniform low license law failed, so we have something to be thankful for.

LEGISLATIVE AND OTHER NEWS.

In the last letter from Maine reference was made to the hearing before the judiciary committee of the legislature on behalf of municipal suffrage for women. The committee presented two reports, the majority unfavorable to the bill, which was defeated in the House by a majority of nine votes. On March 23, however, the Senate passed the bill 16 to 13. The next day it came up in the House only to be again defeated after a lively discussion of about two hours. Many spectators were present and the speakers were loudly applauded both from the floor and galleries. Mr. Powers, of Houlton, Aroostook County, headed the suffragists, while Mr. Brown, of Waterville, led the opposition. One man paid a fine compliment (?) to the men of his state by giving as his argument against the bill, "It is uncertain whether the women would lift us up or we should drag them down." Although more time was devoted to the preservation of the moose, caribou and lobster than to taxation without representation, the suffragists realize that the action of the Senate was a long step forward and that the day of justice to women cannot be far distant.

Apropos to the suffrage question one can but notice how the attitude of the more conservative women is slowly but surely changing. Thus at a recent meeting of the Woman's Literary Union of Lewiston and Auburn, composed of the woman's literary clubs of the two cities, papers were read by four club presidents on the following subjects: "What education best fits a woman for domestic life?" "For literary and professional life?" "For religious and philanthropic life?" "For business and political life?" The last was by Mrs. Peaslee, former president of Auburn W. C. T. U., and one of our state organizers. Though she stated the progress which suffrage has already made in this country, and paid a graceful tribute to Miss Willard and Lady Somerset as noble type of the women who are prominent in political movements, no one seemed in the least shocked.

AMONG THE UNIONS.

Houlton has had its third Demorest medal contest under W. C. T. U. auspices. The seven contestants, three boys and four girls, were pupils of the grammar school. The medal was awarded Miss Beatrice Beam. Fine music was interspersed during the exercises. Much credit is due the local superintendent of contests, Mrs. Wither, and the union is very grateful to Miss A. F. Carson, the contestants' teacher, and to Miss Jennie Snow, of the intermediate grade, who arranged a pleasing tambourine drill for twelve of her pupils. Forty-four dollars and ninety cents were taken in admission fees, though the sum charged was only ten cents, as the object of the contest was not to make money, but to let people hear the truth from winsome boys and girls. Professor Thomas, of Ricker Classical Institute, has another class in training and another contest will soon be given. The Houlton white-ribboners feel that they are very fortunate in having teachers so ready to aid in training these young temperance orators.

The unions of the "twin cities," Lewiston and Auburn, are as usual full of work. Mrs. Wyman, whose special province it is to secure homes for homeless children, has brought her practice into harmony with her preaching by adopting a four-year-old girl. A superintendents' conference was recently held at Main Street Free Baptist church, at which Mrs. Emeline Burlingame Cheney gave an interesting talk on the growth of the W. C. T. U. The Lewiston clergymen have preached able temperance sermons at the request of the union, paying the highest compliments to the organization and especially to our National president.

A few days ago the county sheriff and fourteen deputies descended upon the suspected places and seized in all about five thousand dollars worth of liquor. This act was truly refreshing to the temperance people of the community who had noted the inertia of officials during the past few months.

Dr. Elizabeth Horr, one of our most successful physicians, read a paper on "Woman's Work" not long ago, before the Auburn union, and at the last meeting Mr. Dean, an evangelist who is conducting a rescue mission in Lewiston, while taking a course of study at Cobb Divinity School, presented the needs of the work, especially the need of a rescue home for women and girls located in one of the two cities, in order that they may be offered temporary shelter, and the opportunity to lead different lives. Mr. Dean presented some startling facts in regard to the moral condition of the community, and it is hoped that the matter may rest so heavily upon the hearts of the Christian people of the two cities that such a home may be provided in the near future. At this meeting the union was glad to welcome the presidents of the Lewiston and Greene societies.

As Maine's reporter is not possessed of clairvoyant powers, she trusts that those white-ribboners who have permitted their ink to congeal during the past cold winter, will thaw it out now that milder days have come, and keep her a little better informed of the bright things they are doing.

MARYLAND.

AN INTERESTING BUDGET.

Interesting reports from many sources are at hand. The first in order was inadvertently omitted from my last state letter. This was a reception at the Memorial Building, Baltimore, given to the members of the union, by the officers of the Baltimore City union. The hours were from 3 to 8 p. m. Tea was served at 6:30, and pertinent addresses made at 4 and at 8 p. m. The occasion was unique, profitable and enjoyable.

The Baltimore City union, which comprises twenty-five local unions, is always active, alert and progressive, and renders invaluable aid to the general work of the state in addition to the work in the city proper. The president of this union, Mrs. A. C. Robinson, a birthright member of the Society of Friends, is most admirably adapted to the leadership of this important work.

The Baltimore union, one of the twenty-five locals in the city organization, has accomplished much recently in house-to-house visitation for the purpose of obtaining statistics regarding self-supporting women to send to the Columbian Exposition with other reports of woman's work in Maryland. Evangelistic work, work among colored people and for purity, are also reported of this union.

Other recent notable events in the city work are a "musical tea," given by the Whatsoever Circle of the King's Daughters, for the benefit of the free kindergarten of the union; the fifth annual meeting of the Hampden union; the third annual of the Memorial union, and the quarterly meeting of the city union. The principal work of the Memorial union is to look after homeless girls, and twenty were thus aided by the union during the past year

The most important proceedings at the city meeting were the consideration of a proposal to establish an industrial home in connection with the work, and the publicity given to the statement made by a public school teacher, that large sales of brandy or whisky candy drops are made continually to school children by confectioners or small dealers. Mrs. Robinson stated that, through her visits to the city police stations, she had been impressed with the need of furnishing industrial work for the women found there and with the importance of teaching in this direction. Mrs. Robinson said also, that while working a year ago to secure from the state legislature a bill requiring matrons at the police stations, she thought she realized the full importance of this measure, but that since her familiarity with the work, she finds she had not then begun to realize its importance. She gave also in this connection an incident similar to a pathetic one told by Mrs. Barney, in which a woman of notoriously violent character and behavior was calmed and quieted through the gentle influences of the matron, and to the great astonishment of the officers, who were only too well accustomed to the outrageous scenes attending the woman's arrest and ride to the city jail. Surely, every station in the land that has female prisoners within its walls, should have them in a woman's care, and Baltimore's splendid success in this direction is most encouraging.

The statement in regard to the alcoholic candy drops was subsequently corroborated through the efforts, I judge, of the city press, and several articles on this "nefarious trade" have been published in the large dailies. The existence of a turn-table, run on the principle of a wheel of fortune, for the allurement of money from the children, was also discovered by one of the press reporters, but since the published reports of the discussion of the subject at this meeting, the dealers are both shy and wary. The press makes the assertion that "any dealer found selling these drops will be reported to the grand jury by the ladies of the association." Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth!

Mrs. Mary Marriage Allen, the well-known worker among colored people, was present at this meeting, and spoke briefly of her work. Mrs. Allen has spent three months recently in North Carolina and Virginia, and 1,506 temperance pledges are among the results of her work. Mrs. Allen said that the work in North Carolina, as she has seen it, is the best of any of which she knows.

Kent county reports an important meeting of the county union in March. The proposition of the county superintendent of scientific temperance instruction to supply the teachers of the public schools with the "Helps" for oral instruction was approved, and the necessary funds voted for the purpose. The discussion of the value of leagues in securing the enforcement of law and order occupied considerable time and attention. The main feature of the evening meeting was an address by Miss Elizabeth Yates, of Maine, National lecturer in the department of franchise. The address of Miss Yates met with such favor that she was induced to remain for the public church services on Sunday evening.

The Loyal Temperance Legion of Kennedyville, this county, gave a memorable evening recently to a large number of the citizens of that locality. With the first notes of an inspiring march, fifty-two girls and boys formed into line, marched to positions on the stage in the town hall, forming a charming picture, as with blithe voices they sang, "Happy, Hopeful Children We." Recitations, choruses, solos, instrumental music, a doll drill, and a Japanese fan drill made up the delightful program. Among the songs were, "Temperance Boys and Girls are We," "The Golden Chariot," "Pitcher or Jug," and others of like appropriate character, and among the recitations, "A Little Boy's Speech," "What I Like," "What I Think," and "Boys' Rights." The whole entertainment was a complete success, and the little folk were greatly encouraged by the warm appreciation shown them.

A sunflower tea, given by the Y's of Chestertown, this county, must also be noted. This was also "a thing of beauty and joy," and a great success. About one hundred and fifty persons participated in the pleasures of the occasion.

The United Y, of Fairlee, also in this county, is composed of young people of the village and surrounding country, and is a most popular organization. It is said of it that, "This society is hard to be outdone in numbers, good results or wise management, and its leaders are equally successful in arranging for amusements for its membership." Among the works of this union is the study of the state minutes, an admirable plan most worthy of a large following by our unions. At a recent meeting, scientific temperance instruction was among the topics considered. It was ably explained by the county superintendent of the department, who gave also many timely suggestions as to work in this line. The World's Petition was circulated and signed, and committees were appointed to arrange for temperance services in churches near, after the plan presented by the National superintendent of evangelistic work. Instruction in music, with "White Ribbon Vibrations" to select from, was given recently to the members. A most valuable feature in connection with the work of this union is the interesting reports of its meetings published by a popular newspaper of the county, The Kent News.

Baltimore county reports excellent work at Warren, through the instrumentality mainly of a good worker from Baltimore, who has made her home in the village for some months. This place is peopled principally by the employés of the cotton mills located here, and the residence of this consecrated woman in the place is due primarily to the foresight and wisdom of Mrs. Baldwin, the president of the state union. Mrs. Haslup, state organizer, addressed a meeting here, a short time since.

The Y's of Mt. Washington, this county, have held two notable meetings recently. One at the home of the president of the union, at which the state secretary of Y's and the state corresponding secretary were present, and the other a large public meeting in the M. E. church on "Temperance Sunday" afternoon. The last was held at this time in place of the regular Sunday-school exercises, through the kindly courtesy of the pastor and the superintendent of the school.

The first state conference of the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in Baltimore, March 24. Miss Anne R. Stewart, state secretary of Y's, presided well, wisely and effectively. The attendance was excellent, a good indication of the interest taken by the girls in the work and a most hopeful promise for the future. Reports from the unions were read, showing the work throughout the state to be in a healthful and progressive condition. Three sessions were held. Miss Clara Parrish, of Illinois, National organizer, was present, and greatly assisted in many ways, giving also the address of the evening. Her subject on this occasion was "The Possibilities and the Responsibilities of the Young Woman," and these were forcibly and graphically delineated. The state officers, Mrs. Baldwin, Mrs. Lake, Miss Small and Miss Cathcart, Mrs. Robison, president of the City union, and various members of the older unions, were among the visitors to the conference. The arrangements for the meeting were admirably made and conducted, and the conference throughout was a decided success.

Washington's birthday, as celebrated at the free kindergarten of the union, must be mentioned here, as the exercises were of deep interest from their connection with some of the social problems of the day. American flags abounded in the room, and American national airs were sung by the children, each waving a small American flag. Stories of Columbus and his great discovery and of Washington and his unselfish patriotism, were told, the little ones assisting with their childish words and ways and every possible effort was made to impress upon their susceptible minds the fact of their being American citizens. As the majority are of foreign parentage, Poles and Italians predominating, the value of these teachings cannot be overestimated. A little feast in place of the usual simple dinner, helped, undoubtedly, to deepen the impressions of the day.

The annual meeting of the state temperance alliance will be held in Baltimore, May 2, 3, and 4. M. A. L.

MINNESOTA.

LEGISLATIVE NOTES.

Probably it has been many years since the Minnesota legislature had a session more interesting to W. C. T. U. people than this winter, if, indeed, it ever had. Several bills have been introduced of great interest to persons of our way of thinking; but alas! the introduction was, in some cases, as far as they got. The anti pool room bill, intended to do away with much gambling, was introduced in the House and passed there, only to fail of any success in the Senate. But the better class of newspapers advocated it, and thus their readers were made alive on the issue as never before.

A cigarette bill, to make it an offense for minors to buy, sell or use these detestable things, was introduced into the House by Hon. P. H. Kelly, of St. Paul. This provoked much merriment, and some papers more than hinted that Mr. Kelly was wasting the valuable time of the House in joking, but he succeeded in convincing his fellow lawmakers that he was in earnest, and secured its passage in the House, but after going to the Senate it was lost to the public view, and is probably doomed to indefinite postponement, or is hidden away to die a lingering death in some committee, unless, indeed, some of our women who are interesting themselves in the matter succeed in reviving it.

But the suffrage bill has been the one attraction of most interest. Hon. John Day Smith, of Minneapolis, introduced the bill into the Senate, asking for municipal suffrage for women, with an educational qualification. The judiciary committee to which it was referred, accorded a hearing to Mrs. Julia B. Nelson, president of Minnesota Suffrage Association, and state franchise superintendent of the W. C. T. U., and Mrs. A. B. Turley, of Minneapolis. Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, who was a member of the committee, also spoke in favor of the bill. This committee decided that the bill must take the form of a constitutional amendment, and a substitute for the original bill was therefore reported back to the Senate and made the special order of the afternoon of February 15, on which occasion Senators Smith, Donnelly, Leavitt and Lommen stood as valiant champions of equal suffrage, and the senate chamber rang with dignified, eloquent and truthful speeches. Only Senator Mayo made special opposition to it, quoting statistics of crime, deducing therefrom dark reflections upon the training of children, for all of which of course only mothers are to blame, and concluding—logical man! that only old maids and divorced women were advocating the bill.

It was found that the bill had some inconsistencies, and in its final form it was amended so that the right of franchise and also the right to hold office shall be extended to all women, or in other terms the word "male" shall be stricken out of the constitution and the words "such person" be substituted for the word "he" wherever it occurs. As thus amended and accepted by the committee, the passage of the bill was recommended and the report adopted by a vote of 26 to 14. The third hearing was on March 21. The call of the Senate showed a very large attendance, and the roll-call of the vote on this bill was frequently interrupted by explanations of the voters. Two senators voted in the affirmative because the people of their respective districts had bombarded them with petitions to that effect. Two or three tried to be funny—their votes were in the negative. Others explained affirmative votes by saying they believed it right. The bill passed by a vote of 31 to 19. Before the session closes (April 10), it has twenty days in which to run the gauntlet of the house three times.

Mrs. Julia B. Nelson has been at the capitol much of the time, using her utmost endeavors to secure the passage of the bill. She has spoken several times in the city, and on the evening of March 13, lectured in the Senate chamber, which was very graciously tendered for the occasion. She also took care to have suffrage leaflets laid on the desks of the legislators, including a copy of the resolutions of the legislature of Wyoming on the question.

OTHER NOTES.

Although Mrs. Russell has gone to another state, she is still held in loving remembrance here, and every large fire emphasizes the usefulness of the coffee cart, which originated with her. One cold morning recently the firemen were called out between five and six o'clock in the morning, before any of them had had time for breakfast, and it was nine o'clock ere they could leave their posts. It was then that the coffee cart was most appreciated, as one or two at a time, the fire laddies stepped up to it and hastily swallowed a cup of the steaming coffee and ate the genuine home-made doughnuts. Their appreciation of this care for their comfort was shown by the three hearty cheers for Mrs. Russell, as, their work finally done, they drove away. And who can say how many nickels and dimes the adjacent saloons lost?

The last number of the Minnesota White-Ribboner contained a copy of a letter from Mrs. Hobart to Mrs. Grover Cleveland, welcoming her, in the name of Minnesota's six thousand white-ribboners, back to the responsible position she holds. The White-Ribboner, by the way, is constantly gaining ground in the regard of our women. No worker can afford to be without it. The last number contains a special offer which local unions will do well to heed. The paper is offered in packages of twenty-five for distribution for three months at two dollars and fifty cents; for six months, five dollars; or one year, ten dollars. Surely every union can take hold of this, and thus aid in distributing temperance literature.

The Waterville W. C. T. U. held a special meeting recently for the purpose of opening their mite-boxes, and received the neat sum of fourteen dollars and one cent; and the Band of Hope donated a box containing four dollars and three cents, making a total of eighteen dollars and four cents. Three ladies had filled their boxes. The union is not strong, except in hope and faith, the very best capital they could have.

The Mills meetings now in progress in this city are of great interest. Nothing like it has ever been known here. Some of the city unions have not held their usual meetings, to give opportunity for members to attend the afternoon Mills meetings. This cannot fail to be beneficial to the unions, for no Christian can listen to the earnest expositions of the gospel without receiving new impetus and a fresh consecration of all her powers is sure to follow. Many hundreds are seeking Christ; and in the after-work of looking after these converts the unions must be ready to bear their part.

ARKANSAS.

GENERAL STATE ITEMS.

The annual state W. C. T. U. convention for 1893 will be held at Little Rock, opening Tuesday, April 25, and closing April 27. Miss Frances Griffin, of Alabama, is to be the lecturer of the occasion. Mrs. F. L. Sutton, the W. C. T. U. corresponding secretary and state reporter for THE UNION SIGNAL, had the misfortune to lose her lovely home in Hope by fire a few months since, and now is suffering severely with her eyes. She being prohibited from writing, this report will lack much of interesting work done throughout the state. Nobly has she given her time, strength and talents to the cause in Arkansas. Well beloved, she sits enthroned in our hearts.

The most telling work during the year will be the passage of the scientific instruction bill. It has passed the Senate with little or no opposition, has passed the first reading in the House, and will undoubtedly become a law. Mrs. Harris, police matron, also superintendent of legislation, is at the fore; during the introduction of the bill, Mrs. Dunlop, state president, spent two weeks at the capitol. The present assembly have struck some good blows for the temperance cause. The state has a number of special acts prohibiting the sale of liquor within three to six miles of a church or school. Several towns sustained their special act in defiance of the combined force of the liquor power. Yet the entire vote against license was smaller than for the past several years, owing to the fact of the people being engaged on issues—as they thought—of more importance.

Hot Springs county voted against license for the first time, while White county, which had been dry for ten years, voted it in. The new unions at Newport, Cotton Plant and Redfield are doing well. From lack of funds there has been no lecturer steadily in the field, in lieu of which the Demorest medal contests have taken hold with good effect. A gold medal contest will be held at Little Rock the last night of the convention. The L. T. Legions, under the able leadership of Mrs. Yantis, are doing the work, from which shall be reaped a bountiful harvest "bye and bye."

The World's Petition has been circulated in all parts of the state. The exhibit for the World's Fair is now ready. It is the old state shield, with Hot Springs crystals for lettering. The state banner will also be sent. The unions have contributed liberally to this object.

The Woman's Chronicle is not being published now, the editor being quite ill. The women of the state feel this to be a blow to the cause of temperance and equal rights, and are endeavoring to have the paper started again by forming a stock company.

The state has been bereaved indeed since the beginning of the new year, in the deaths of Mrs. R. L. Dodge and Mrs. Jenkins, both of Little Rock, Ark. Mrs. Dodge was for two years, 1881 and 1882, president of the state W. C. T. U. "A woman of influence, culture and conservatism, she was eminently qualified for the position she so graciously filled." Her life was full of charity and Christian work.

Mrs. Jenkins was at the time of her death vice-president of the Woman's Suffrage Society. A life-long helper of the oppressed, she went about doing the bidding of her Master. Now she is at rest, and the world is better and happier that she lived.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE Georgia state convention will be held April 25-29, at Macon.

THE seventh district Kentucky W. C. T. U. will hold their annual convention in Midway, May 3 and 4.

MRS. W. P. KUHL, president of the twelfth district, Illinois W. C. T. U., will soon remove to Champaign.

ENCOURAGING reports come from Beardstown, Ill. Thirty-eight members have been added to the W. C. T. U. and a Y of forty-six members has been organized. Col. Charles Holt was with the people of Beardstown and was eminently successful.

THE National minutes and annual leaflet both give a wrong address for the superintendent of Sabbath observance. It should be Mrs. Josephine C. Bateham, Williamsburg, Ky.

THE seventeenth annual convention of the second district of Michigan will convene in the M. E. church, Dundee, April 26 and 27. Entertainment will be furnished to those whose names are sent to the chairman of the entertainment committee, Mrs. Mattie Gainsley, Dundee, and department superintendents are expected to give a five-minute report of the year's work.

GOVERNOR LEWELLING, of Kansas, signed the equal suffrage bill in the presence of a number of ladies and gave the pen used to Mrs. Laura M. Johns, president Kansas E. S. A., who presented it to the state Historical society. The amendment will be voted upon at the general election in 1894, which leaves a year and a half to work for its adoption. If carried it will be two years before women will have an opportunity to exercise their new right of franchise.

MRS. DR. H. H. GEORGE winged her flight from earth to heaven on February 28. She was an active and earnest worker in the W. C. T. U. of College Hill, Beaver Falls, of which she was president for several years. She was also county superintendent of the department of social purity; and this not in name merely—for whatever work she undertook she performed with faithfulness. Whether in efforts to suppress offensive open air dances or to cleanse the streets from obscene advertisements, in distributing pure literature, in securing petitions to congressmen, for the passing of bills to protect the youth of our land and to World Fair commissioners to exclude evil from the art galleries of the Exposition, in every direction, her quiet, unostentatious, persevering efforts were on behalf of all that was pure and against all that was evil.

THE following resolution was most heartily indorsed by the Chicago Central W. C. T. U. at its annual meeting in Willard Hall, April 6:

"In view of the unwarranted and malicious attacks which have been so persistently made upon our honored and beloved President, Mrs. Matilda B. Carse;

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Central W. C. T. U., declare our unshaken confidence in her integrity, our unwavering faith in her honesty of purpose, our admiration for her disinterested devotion to the interests of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and we herewith extend to her our warmest sympathy and love, and pledge to her our cordial support in the future as in the past.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mrs. Carse, to our official organ, THE UNION SIGNAL, and to the press of this city."

Official Communications.

THE PURITY DEPARTMENT.

Many letters of inquiry are coming to us in regard to the organization of White Shield societies, and the procuring of White Shield pledges. These letters show a wide-spread interest in this phase of our work, and suggest the thought that many are ready to take up the work but are deterred by lack of knowledge of methods. As neither pledges nor manuals of instruction can be procured of the W. T. P. A., we have arranged to furnish them ourselves. Orders, or letters of inquiry can be addressed to Lydia A. Prescott, 1412 Adams street, Toledo, Ohio.

The pledges will not cost more than fifty cents per hundred. The manual will soon be ready and the price announced at the earliest possible moment.

There is no better way to enthuse people in any matter than to show them that success has followed like efforts, therefore a report of a successful White Shield society will be of especial interest at this time. Some four or five years ago Dr. Mary Wood Allen organized a White Shield society in the state normal school at West Chester, Pa. A letter just received from the school says: "I am glad to have the opportunity to tell you that the work you started here has made progress. As near as I can now recall about four hundred and seventy-five girls have taken the pledge in the years of the existence of the society. At first it was a separate society, being virtually merely mothered by the temperance society. It has seemed best of late not to emphasize it as a separate organization, as there are so many societies to join; so now we have meetings at various times and get signers to the pledge without emphasizing that they are joining another society. Our constitution is very simple, merely stating name, object, officers, conditions of membership, etc. Recitations, talks, music, essays, etc., make up our programs. The successive clauses of the pledge taken as subjects of discussion for successive meetings we have found a good method."

The practical workings of this organization will be suggestive to those who are anxious to begin work at once. The power of this organization is not in aggressive methods but in a quiet, pervasive, personal influence. As the above letter indicates, it can become an accessory to societies already existing, increasing their range of usefulness while not cumbering them with burdensome machinery.

In Lititz, Pa., Dr. Allen organized a White Shield Society with forty-nine members as a separate organization, and in the same town the pledge cards were given to the pupils in the Linden Hall Seminary with the intent to make it a part of the work of the Students' Christian Association.

We should be glad to have a report from all societies that are organized either distinct, or as parts of other associations. By this means we can become sympathetically united and be able to help and encourage each other. Letters of inquiry will be most cordially answered by your deeply interested co-worker,

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Inquiries for White Shield pledges, etc., having come to the W. T. P. A., a statement in regard to the matter seems necessary. With the expressed approval of Miss Willard, then Supt. of the Purity Department, the W. T. P. A. decided in Jan., 1891, not to issue White Shield literature. This action was taken for the following reasons, among others: As the term, "White Shield" was used by the originator of the title, it was restricted in its meaning, and failed to cover some important lines of work which the Department wished to take up; the resultant confusion was best avoided by dropping the title, and substituting for the White Shield pledge one which corresponds with our standard of equal purity by being suitable for use by both sexes, and which includes, also, personal purity and the lending of a helping hand to others. This is known as the Purity Pledge.

PETITION OF THE WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE HOME

Addressed to the Governments of the World.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

Our Library Table.

The NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE for the present month contains two articles that will be widely read. They are "Trinity Church, Boston," by the late Phillips Brooks, selections from an historical sermon preached at the dedication of the new church, February 11, 1877; "Description of Trinity Church," by H. H. Richardson, architect. The accompanying illustrations are exceptionally fine, among them a portrait of the recently deceased rector and one of Rev. E. Winchester Donald, D. D., the present rector.

Chicago being the "observed of all observers," the leading magazines unite in pointing their best efforts to awake interest in "The City by the Lake" and THE CENTURY opens its April number with a minute review of not very far past troubles in an article by Joseph E. Gary, entitled "The Chicago Anarchist of 1886; the Crime, the Trial and the Punishment." The article, coming from the source it does, is historically valuable and will serve to clear up lingering doubts and perplexities in not a few honest minds.

The Century Co., Union Square, New York.

A very beautiful issue is the Easter number of THE SILVER CROSS, published by the International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons. Mary Lowe Dickinson contributes a poem, "The Easter Guest" and a freshly suggestive Easter story, "Miss Margaret." Some one under the nom de plume of "Ettrick" is the author of an article about Jennie Casseday, who has learned at last all that Easter means. The magazine contains over thirty pages of choice matter, including an Indian department, a department of foreign missions, Canadian department, "Our Bible Study," children's department, the King's Sons' department, etc.

158 West 23d street, New York City.

The April ATLANTIC MONTHLY draws to a close Mary Hartwell Catherwood's most successful story of "Old Kaskaskia." A paper of interest contains the "Unpublished Correspondence of William Hazlitt, the distinguished English essayist." Edward Everett Hale contributes the second and concluding paper on "My College Days," which is doubtless serving to awaken proud and pleasant memories in many who shared with the now distinguished writer those days of mingled work and amusement. "Miss Tom and Peepsie" is a story by A. M. Ewell, as unusual in plot as its title is odd. The sketch of Phillips Brooks, by Alexander V. G. Allen, goes beyond detail, and enters into an analysis of his character and work.

The QUARTERLY ILLUSTRATOR this month greets its many and admiring patrons only for the second time, but its first appearance three months ago insured its hearty reception at this time. It has no competitor in the long list of periodicals offered for public favor and it is safe to assert would easily distance any that might appear. Its province is to gather the cream of the illustrations that have appeared in the great magazines during the quarter preceding each issue and present them, in the most perfect mechanical dress obtainable, together with "special articles, biographical sketches and clever critiques by well known writers profusely illustrated with original drawings by the foremost artists of the country." The issue in hand contains illustrations by fifty different artists and is in truth a "thing of beauty."

Pub. by Harry C. Jones, 92-94 Fifth Ave., New York City.

THE MAGAZINE OF POETRY makes its quarterly visit to the Library Table at a very auspicious time this spring month, when poetry comes as easily to the spirit as breathing. One lingers long over the portrait of Lucy Larcom, whose name has become a tender household world. The strong, grave face, full of rest and sweetness, is a fitting outward and visible sign of the inward and spiritual grace which has been the fountain head of her beautiful writings. Of the selections from her poems, made by the MAGAZINE OF POETRY, we choose one gem entitled, "Aspiration":

"Thou mayst not rest in any lovely thing,
Thou who wert formed to seek and to aspire;
For no fulfillment of thy dreams can bring
The answer to thy measureless desire.
The beauty of the round, green world is not
Of the world's essence; for within the sky
The tints which make this bubble bright are wrought;
The bubble bursts; the light can never die."

The magazine has reviews of the life and work of thirty poets with portraits, and is a valuable acquisition.

A WONDER-TALE.

"Columbus: and What He Found," by Mrs. Mary H. Hull, is a wonder-tale filled with all the romance and truth of the great event of America's discovery, and told for young readers in a pure yet thrilling manner. There is already a large demand for this unique child's history among parents and teachers who desire to answer authentically all questions and controversies which come to the ears of children. Columbus will be always with us as much a feature in the future as Washington, being the step beyond Washington and the home-nation into the great mother, Europe, and the beginnings of the child Columbia. This book is filled with patriotic enthusiasm. Price $1.

Spare Pearline, Spoil the Wash! "Better use too much than too little." Too much Pearline won't do any harm—too little may. Use too much, and you only waste it, that's all. But use too little, and it's only a bit better than none at all. You'll have to work harder, and you'll have to rub—and then the wear and tear begins. It's this rubbing, and this wear, and this work that Pearline, if properly used, takes away.

Use it just as directed on every package, no more, no less, and you'll get the best results. You needn't try to improve upon it. You can't.

Beware of imitations. 365 JAMES PYLE, N.Y.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Those attending the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church at Washington, D. C., May 17th to June 2d, can see more of this country, can view the most picturesque scenery in America, and, if traveling from the West to the East, can cross the Alleghany Mountains, 2,000 feet above the sea level, and can traverse the historic Potomac Valley, which was the theater of the war between the states, by traveling via the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. This company operates vestibuled express trains, to Washington from Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Pittsburgh in the West, and from New York, Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore in the East. All express trains of the Baltimore and Ohio Company run via Washington, and carry Pullman sleeping and parlor cars. The rate to the General Assembly will be a fare and a third for the round trip on the certificate plan. For more detailed information as to rates, time of trains, and sleeping-car accommodations, apply to Chas. O. Scull, General Passenger Agent, Baltimore, Md.; L. S. Allan, Assistant General Passenger Agent, the Rookery, Chicago; O. P. McCarty, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. P. Craig, General Eastern Passenger Agent, 415 Broadway, New York, or James Potter, District Passenger Agent, 833 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

Write to John J. Byrne, Asst. Passenger Traffic Manager, 723 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., if you are interested in California, and he will send you some reading matter.

In the April number of The Advance Guard, Miss Alice Guernsey with her concise and explicit directions makes it possible for every boy and girl to see the great Columbian Exposition safely and profitably.

Among other excellent things to be found in the April issue is a story upon Hindu child slavery which is both instructive and pitifully interesting. The faces in the picture of four Hindu child widows emphasizes the sad truths of the story. Price one copy per annum, $.50.

DANESBURY HOUSE.

Our attention has been called to a recent publication of Rand, McNally & Co., of Chicago—"Danesbury House," which obtained the $500 prize of the Scottish Temperance League, and has been called the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of the Temperance party, 305,000 copies being sold in England. The American edition has an introduction by Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset, who most heartily indorse the work. It may be obtained of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, The Temple, in cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

NEW LEAFLETS.

We have just published three new total abstinence leaflets, by Josephine R. Nichols. Numbers eleven, twelve and thirteen all upon the subject of "Beer," "Is Beer a Temperance Drink?" "Beer versus Food," "A Crusade against Beer," are the three titles. Give number eleven to your friend who claims "If we would have the country temperate we must make it a universal beer consuming country." Root out the superstition that there is nutriment in beer, with number twelve, and you will have inaugurated a crusade against the beer traffic which will be still more effective by a careful perusal of number thirteen.

Dr. Cushman is the superintendent of the Bethesda Mission, which is located in one of the worst sections of Chicago. If you want to know how to help just such people as she is helping there every day, send to the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association for a copy of the Bible reading for March, 1893, on "Convalescence."

FOR PITY'S SAKE.

This is the title of a new total abstinence leaflet, condensed from one bearing the same title, which is published by the B. W. T. A. It is a touching appeal in behalf of the weak and tempted ones, who cannot resist the deadly appetite, which overpowers their resolutions and makes a desolation of life.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions, for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp naming this paper, W. A. NOYES' 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

NO DUST AND HEAT.

The rock-ballasted roadbed and the direct route over the summit of the cool Allegheny Mountains make the Pennsylvania Short Lines especially desirable for a trip to the East. Through trains from Chicago to Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia, New York, make quick time. Address DERING, 248 Clark street, Chicago.

CHAUTAUQUA LAKE, New York, is the Mecca of many a pilgrim in summer who there finds rest and recreation, but never until now has it been regarded as a winter resort. The transformation of Sterlingworth Inn, the most fashionable and popular of all the famous summer hotels of Chautauqua's Saratoga (Lakewood), into a Sanitarium for treatment of Lung, Throat and Nervous diseases is therefore the more notable. The elegant surroundings and homelike comforts which have attracted thousands in summers past, are rapidly filling the Inn, inside of which the potted plants and trees, combined with the warmth and verdure of the South, make one feel as though he had been transported to sunny Florida or the balmy Bermudas, and while guest or patient, as the case may be, he feels as though his lines were cast in pleasant places, and the quiet restfulness appeals to his sense of home comforts.

"I SHOULD say from experience that alcohol is the most destructive agent that we are aware of in this country."—Sir William Gull.

THE almost unanimous testimony of a large number of superintendents of insane and poor-houses is that poverty is the effect, not the cause of intemperance.

M. ODESSA, the first native Mahometan woman who has been admitted to practice medicine among Mahometan ladies, passed a brilliant examination.

THE Ragged school union in England has been instrumental in sending five thousand one hundred children, factory girls and boys, to the holiday homes in the country and by the seaside.

AN English paper draws the following contrast: James Sumner, charged with beating his wife, kicking her and otherwise abusing her, is fined twenty shilling and costs. Thomas Swift, charged with stealing two fowls, sentenced to three years imprisonment and two years supervision.

ST. JOHN'S GUILD, of New York City, has for its special work, providing the poor and sick with a summer outing. Last year the Floating Hospital, under its charge, cared for almost fifty thousand patients. Their Seaside Hospital has been so successful that an addition is to be built.

CERTAIN regiments in India were kept under strict observation. The five thousand six hundred soldiers were divided into three classes, free and moderate drinkers and total abstainers. The death rate of the free drinkers was four times and the death rate of the moderate drinkers twice that of the abstainers.

THE Royal Commission on prohibition in Canada brought to light the fact that the great Hudson Bay company has gone into the liquor business extensively, much to its disgrace. The desire of this company has heretofore been to restrict the alcohol traffic and preserve a high, moral tone among its employés.

THE managers of a Brussels workingmen's union have printed circulars giving a résumé of the increase in the consumption of liquor and the consequent increase of poverty and crime. The support of the poor has become an almost intolerable burden and yet the country permits 83,800 rum shops to rob the laborers.

PHILLIPS BROOKS' class at Harvard, the class of 1855, proposes to erect at the seat of the university a suitable memorial to his memory. It is to be a building worth $300,000 for religious services and is to be made the center of the religious life of the school. The class intends to give one-tenth of the amount if the whole is raised before commencement.

"THE temperance movement," says the Glasgow Herald, "is spreading rapidly among railroad men. Already ten thousand white buttons, stamped with initials signifying the Railroad Temperance Association, have been distributed among engineers and trainmen, and the demand for them has been so great that fifty thousand more have been ordered."

THE New York Medical Times gives the following temperance or *in*temperance statistics: "In Great Britain and Ireland 145,000 persons are every year committed to prison as drunkards; 112,000 of these are men, the rest women. Three thousand and four women were murdered in the United Kingdom from January 1, 1889, to January 1, 1891, by drunken husbands. There are 30,000 criminals in German prisons, 14,000 of whom were arrested for crimes committed while intoxicated.

A Great Sensation.

Pain is a sensation—health is more the lack of it. This fact is often overlooked by sick people who demand, first of all, that a remedy shall produce a great sensation. This fact often militates against the trial of Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen. When people learn that its base is the air we breathe, and that it is introduced to the system like common air through the lungs (and unlike common medicine through the stomach), they are skeptical. Nevertheless, over 60,000 people have concluded that, what keeps us alive, is able, when greatly enriched with ozone, to make us more alive; i. e., restore the weakened system. They have, therefore, been led to try the simple means and have found the blessed result. This is the best sensation of all. Who are they? Where are they? What had they? If you are really interested, inquire of Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

Desiring to give the admirers of Ivory Soap an opportunity to contribute to its literature, the manufacturers offered prizes for the best twelve verses suitable for use as advertisements. 27,388 contributions were received. To the following was awarded the

ELEVENTH PRIZE.

Do you say my cut glass sparkles
Like a diamond without flaw?
Ivory Soap has bid its beauties
From its use new luster draw.
Silver spoons, my souvenirs,
Vie with windows, in their gleam
Owing to the magic influence
Of the Ivory's power to clean.
Blankets, too, have felt its spell
And left the tub like Alpine snow:
Laces, in their gauzy whiteness,
Still another laurel throw.
From fine bric-a-brac poetic,
To prosaic washing dishes,
It is peerless in its action
And obedient to our wishes.
And the hands that labor with it
Gain in softness, day by day.
Ivory Soap be ever with us,
Faithful servant, true alway.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Zante has again been shaken by a violent earthquake.

Fifty-four carloads of Italian exhibits have reached Jackson Park.

Edwin Booth has suffered another stroke of paralysis and his life is in the balance.

The Home Rule Bill passed its second reading in the British House of Commons, April 20.

Severe gales and a return of winter was the weather program in the northern states last week.

The Earl of Derby, an eminent English politician, sixty-three years of age, died at London, April 21.

Chicago is cleaning up and donning her best clothes for the opening of the Columbian Exposition next Monday.

A rousing mass-meeting was held in Chicago Sunday night to protest against the extradition treaty with Russia.

Invitations to the May-day opening of the Woman's Building have been issued by the Board of Lady Managers this week.

The Australian Joint Stock bank, with two hundred branches, failed last week, the liabilities amounting to sixty-five millions.

Gambling houses are reported as being closed in Louisville, Ky., and city officials are being examined by the grand jury, as a result of the recent developments in wickedness.

To prohibit combinations formed to advance the prices of the necessaries of life is the text of a bill passed by the New York legislature and sent to the governor for his signature last week.

Among the arrivals at Hampton Roads, Va., this week to join the World's Fair naval fleet were three Spanish caravels, representations of the fleet of Columbus, the Pinta, Nina and Santa Maria.

The statue of Christopher Columbus has arrived in Chicago, and will be placed in a commanding position on the lake front this week, ready to greet the millions of World's Fair visitors.

The annual report of the civil service commission urges the extension of the service to other departments of the government, and shows that the whole number of places now subject to competitive examination is 42,928.

IN view of the fact that THE UNION SIGNAL has in the past published favorable notices in relation to Miss Kate Marsden, popularly known as "the Siberian Lepers' Friend," we feel constrained to state to our white-ribbon constituency that credible reports from ministers, editors, philanthropic workers and other reputable men and women in various countries, have caused us to feel that we can no longer indorse Miss Marsden and her work.

READ carefully the short article from Miss Elizabeth U. Yates on page 6. The bad will be mixed so largely with the good in Chicago this summer that it behooves every one to be on his guard. "Wolves in sheep's clothing" will abound, for they always follow the crowd. It is a very easy thing to pin on a white ribbon, and by so doing many a scheming woman will doubtless attempt to gain the confidence of the unwary. Young girls should intrust themselves and their interests with no stranger and should not come to the city alone unless they can take care of themselves.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND, Vice-president Stevenson, the Duke of Veragua, Washington officials and all other special guests of the Exposition will be received in Chicago with military honors, and escorted to the Fair grounds by a platoon of mounted policemen and the Chicago Hussars.

ALL white-ribboners should rejoice over the nomination of Hon. L. C. Hughes, by President Cleveland, for governor of Arizona. Governor Hughes is the husband of the president of Arizona W. C. T. U. and is a staunch woman suffragist and Prohibitionist. He does not conceal his unpopular principles but fought for and won his victory on those lines. All honor to the new governor.

THAT was a very exceptional local superintendent, we hope, who announced that only boys should take part in her Demorest contest, because she wanted a boy to be sure to receive the medal for oratory, which she knew would not be the case if girls competed because one of them was always successful. We know that our good brother Demorest, who founded these contests, would not approve of such an absurd method, and we disclaim it strongly in the name of all white-ribboners.

"THE policy of allying Christian effort with Prohibition politics has done the W. C. T. U. vastly more harm than good in this country," says Rev. Dr. Theodore Cuyler. To this the New York Voice replies: "A comparison of the relative strength and importance of the W. C. T. Union and the National Temperance Society, of which Dr. Cuyler is president, does not seem to us to indicate that the Doctor's advice on matters of policy is altogether infallible. He would do better to seek advice of the W. C. T. U. than to give it."

THE people of this country will have an opportunity this year such as the world never saw before, for the preaching of the gospel of Christ to all people. There should be no failure in establishing the great Auditorium, which has been spoken of, in which Mr. Moody and other evangelists, together with the famous preachers of the world, shall proclaim the glad tidings of the gospel of Christ. Especially will this be needed upon the Sabbath, when the gates of many places of amusement will be open, even if those of the Exposition are closed.

THE Christian Advocate, Leesburg, Fla., says: "The South cannot accept woman's suffrage, for it would carry every colored woman to the polls while the better class would stay at home as a general thing." The absolute confidence in certain quarters that good and intelligent women will refuse to vote and bad and ignorant women flock to the polls, would lead us to think that such a general conviction must be based upon truth, were it not for the fact that thus far wherever women have had the suffrage, it has been the intelligent and good, not the opposite class, whose votes have cut an important figure in the election.

PUNDITA RAMABAI writes us that her school is rapidly outgrowing its new quarters, and that the former schoolrooms must shortly be converted into dormitories. She has now fifty-two boarders, forty of whom are widows, and the other twelve non-widows. These are all young girls of good character. Most of them have been deprived of a home and protection, and are entirely dependent upon Pundita Ramabai. The foundations of a new schoolhouse have been laid, and the building is begun. Meanwhile the building fund raised in America is exhausted, and it will take five thousand rupees more to complete the building. Any one who feels led to help the Pundita in this difficult work would, we need hardly say, be helping a worthy cause. Her work has been described so often in our columns that we need add no more at this time to recommend it. Pundita Ramabai, Poona, India, is the address to which money should be sent. She also needs books, papers and toys for her "child widows."

ANOTHER bright spirit has left earth for heaven, and a thousand lips have uttered in the language of mortals the brief story, "Lucy Larcom is dead." Born in Beverly, Mass., in 1826, she "passed over" from her home in Boston, April 17, 1893, her threescore years and ten not yet complete. When only seven years of age the poetic spirit within her strove for utterance, and her maturer years have given to the world both prose and poetry, the rare spiritual tone of which is but the outbreathing of a soul in close communion with the Master. An estimate of her character may be gathered from the fact that two of her dearest friends were John G. Whittier and Phillips Brooks. Her last published poem appeared recently in the Independent. Its words are strangely prophetic:

"Beside the road I dreamed of heaven;
I dreamed I saw an angel come
Down from those heights to lead me home."

She was laid to rest on the 20th inst., at Mt. Epiphany, and for her heaven is no more a dream.

THE number of deaths in New York City during Easter week was so great that one paper declares it unprecedented in that city. Those from pneumonia alone were three hundred and four. One paper explains this by laying it to the insane mania for appearing on Easter Sunday in spring attire, regardless of weather. New York is not the only city guilty of this wicked foolishness. All over the land, men, women and helpless children were recklessly exposed to the dangers of an inclement season, in apparel utterly unsuited for the day. Nothing more anomalous than this manner of observing Easter was ever evolved out of the depths of human inconsistency. Where in the life, teachings and death of our Lord do people find the basis for celebrating His resurrection by the custom of arraying themselves in gold and costly apparel? And yet, worse things even than this blot the pages of history. Its record compels us to cry with the poet:

"Bear witness, O Thou wronged and crucified one,
That earth's most hateful crimes have in Thy name been done."
